No. T-316 Civil

[fol. 1] AMENDED COMPLAINT—Filed March 22, 1951

1. (a) The jurisdiction of this Court is invoked under Title 28, United States Code, section 1331. This action arises under the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, section 1, and the Act of May 31, 1870, Chapter 114, section 16, 16 Stat. 144 (Title 8, United States Code, section 41), as hereinafter more fully appears. The matter in controversy exceeds, exclusive of interest and costs, the sum or value of Three Thousand Dollars ($3000.00).

(b) The jurisdiction of this Court is also invoked under Title 28, United States Code, section 1343. This action is authorized by the Act of April 20, 1871, Chapter 22, section 1, 17 Stat. 13 (Title 8, United States Code, section 43), to be commenced by any citizen of the United States or other persons within the jurisdiction thereof to redress the deprivation, under color of a state law, statute, ordinance, regulation, custom or usage, or rights, privileges and immunities secured by the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, section 1, and by the Act of May 31, 1870, Chapter 114, section 16, 16 Stat. 144 (Title 8, United States Code, section 41), providing for the equal rights of citizens and of all other persons within the jurisdiction of the United States, as hereinafter more fully appears.

BLEED THROUGH

(c) The jurisdiction of this Court is also invoked under Title 28, United States Code, section 2281. This is an action for an interlocutory injunction and a permanent injunction restraining the enforcement, operation and execution of statutes of the State of Kansas by restraining the action of defendants, officers of such state, in the enforcement and execution of such statutes.

2. This is a proceeding for a declaratory judgment and injunction under Title 28, United States Code, section 2201, for the purpose of determining questions in actual contro- [fol. 2] versy between the parties to wit:

(a) The question of whether the state statute, ch. 72-1724 of the General Statutes of Kansas 1935, is unconstitutional in that it gives to defendants the power to organize and maintain separate schools for the education of white and colored children in the City of Topeka, Kansas.

(b) The question of whether the customs and practices of the defendants operating under Ch. 72-1724 of the General Statutes of Kansas, 1935, are unconstitutional in that they deny infant plaintiffs the rights and privileges of enrolling in, attending and receiving instruction in public schools of the district within which they live while such rights and privileges are granted to white children similarly situated; where the basis of this refusal and grant is the race and color of the children, and that alone.

(c) The question of whether the denial to infant plaintiffs, solely because of race, of educational opportunities equal to those afforded white children is in contravention of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution as being a denial of the equal protection of the laws.

3. (a) Infant plaintiffs are citizens of the United States, the State of Kansas, and Shawnee County, the City of Topeka, Kansas. They are among those classified as Negroes. They reside within various school districts in the City of Topeka, satisfy all requirements for admission to schools within the districts within which they live, have presented themselves for enrollment and registration at the proper times and places, and were denied the right to enroll therein, on account of their race and color. Instead, they are required, solely because of race, to attend schools where they do not and cannot receive educational advantages, opportunities and facilities equal to those furnished white [fol. 3] children.

(b) Adult plaintiffs are citizens of the United States and the State of Kansas, are residents of and domiciled in Topeka, Shawnee County, Kansas, are taxpayers of said county, of the State of Kansas, and of the United States. They are the parents and natural guardians of infant plaintiffs named herein. By being compelled to send their children to schools outside the districts wherein they live rather than to schools within said districts, they must bear certain burdens and forego certain advantages, neither of which is suffered by parents of white children situated similarly to children of plaintiffs.

(c) Plaintiffs bring this action on their own behalf and also on behalf of all citizens similarly situated and affected, pursuant to Rule 23A of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, there being common questions of law and fact affecting the rights of all Negro citizens of the United States similarly situated who reside in cities in the State of Kansas in which separate public schools are maintained for white and Negro children of public school age, and who are so numerous as to make it impracticable to bring them all before the Court.

4. The State of Kansas has declared public education a state function in the Constitution of the State of Kansas, Article 6, Sections 1 and 2. Pursuant to this mandate, the Legislature of Kansas has established a system of free public schools in the State of Kansas, according to a plan set out in Chapter 72 of the General Statutes of Kansas, 1935, and supplements thereto. The establishment, maintenance, and administration of the public school system of Kansas is vested in a Superintendent of Public Instruction, County Superintendent of Schools, and City School Boards. (Constitution of Kansas, Article 6, section 1.)

[fol. 4] 5. The public schools of Topeka, Shawnee County, Kansas are under the control and supervision of the defendants.

BLEED THROUGH

(a) Defendant, Board of Education, is under a duty to enforce the school laws of the State of Kansas (General Statutes of Kansas, 1935, [and supplements thereto,] * section 72-1809); to maintain an efficient system of public schools in Topeka, Shawnee County, Kansas; to determine the studies pursued, the methods of teaching, and to establish such schools as may be necessary to the completeness and efficiency of the school system. It is an administrative department of the State of Kansas, which discharges governmental functions pursuant to the Constitution and the laws of the State of Kansas. (Constitution of Kansas, Article 6, sections 1 and 2, General Statutes, 1935, and supplements thereto of Kansas, section 72-1601). It is declared by law to be a body corporate and is sued in its governmental capacity.

6/22/51 amended at Pre-Trial A.J.M. 1949 72-1724

(b) Defendant Kenneth McFarland is Superintendent of Schools, and holds office pursuant to the Constitution and the laws of the State of Kansas, as an administrative officer of the free public school system of the State of Kansas. He has immediate control of the operation of public schools in Topeka, Shawnee County, Kansas. He is sued in his official capacity.

6. Defendant, Board of Education of Topeka, Shawnee County, Kansas, has established and at the present time maintains in the City of Topeka, State of Kansas, elementary schools for the education of the school children of the City of Topeka. They are located within different districts of the City of Topeka, whose boundaries are designated by the defendant, Board of Education.

7. White Children of elementary school age go to the school within the designated boundaries of the district in which they live.

[fol. 5] Infant plaintiffs live within the boundaries of these districts, but they are required to leave the districts within which they live and travel from one and one-half miles to two miles to separate all-Negro schools, solely because of their race and color and in violation of their rights under the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

* Struck out in copy.

8. The educational opportunities provided by defendants for infant plaintiffs in the separate all-Negro schools are inferior to those provided for white school children similarly situated in violation of the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

9. Adult plaintiffs are required to send their children outside the school districts in which they reside to separate all-Negro schools, whereas parents of white children are permitted to send their children to schools close at hand within the district in which they live, solely because of race and color. Thus adult plaintiffs are being denied the equal protection of the laws in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

10. Infant plaintiffs and adult plaintiffs are thereby being wilfully and unlawfully discriminated against by the defendants on account of their race and color, in that infant plaintiffs are compelled to attend schools outside the school districts in which they live, while white children similarly situated are not so compelled; infant plaintiffs and adult plaintiffs are being deprived of their rights guaranteed by the Constitution and laws of the United States.

11. Plaintiffs are suffering irreparable injury and face irreparable injury in the future by reason of the acts herein complained of. They have no plain, adequate or complete remedy to redress the wrongs and illegal acts herein complained of, other than this suit for a declaration of rights [fol. 6] and an injunction. Any other remedy to which plaintiffs might be remitted would be attended by such uncertainties and delays as to deny substantial relief; would involve a multiplicity of suits; and would cause further irreparable injury not only to plaintiffs, but to defendants as governmental agencies.

Wherefore, plaintiffs respectfully pray that:

1. The Honorable Court, upon filing of this complaint, notify the Chief Judge of this Circuit as required by 28 U. S. C. A., section 2284, so that the Chief Judge may designate two other judges to serve as members of a three-judge court as required by Title 28, U. S. C. A., section 2281, to hear and determine this action.

BLEED THROUGH

2. The Honorable Court enter a judgment or decree declaring that the General Statutes of Kansas, 1935, 72-1724, is unconstitutional insofar as it empowers defendants to set up separate schools for Negro and white school children.

3. The Honorable Court enter a judgment or decree declaring that the policy, custom, usage and practice of defendants in operating under Ch. 72-1724, General Statutes of Kansas, 1935, in denying plaintiffs and other Negro children residing in Topeka, Shawnee County, Kansas, solely because of race or color, the right and privilege of enrolling in, attending and receiving instruction in schools within the district within which they reside as is provided for white children of like qualifications, are denials of the equal protection clause of the United States Constitution and are therefore unconstitutional and void.

4. The Honorable Court issue a permanent injunction forever restraining and enjoining the defendants from executing so much of Ch. 72-1724, General Statutes of Kansas, 1935, as empowers them to set up separate schools for Negro and white school children.

[fol. 7] 5. The Honorable Court issue a permanent injunction forever restraining defendants from denying the Negro school children of Topeka, Shawnee County, Kansas, on account of their race or color, the right and privilege of attending public schools within the district wherein they live, and from making any distinction based upon race or color in the opportunities which the defendants provide for public education.

6. The Honorable Court will allow plaintiffs their costs herein, reasonable fees for attorneys, and such other and further relief as may appear to the Court to be equitable and just.

7. The Honorable Court retain jurisdiction of this cause after judgment to render such relief as may become necessary in the future.

DEFENDANTS' MOTION FOR A MORE DEFINITE STATEMENT AND TO STRIKE—Filed May 15, 1951

Defendants move the court for an order, as follows:

1. Requiring plaintiffs to amend their amended complaint, paragraph 3 (a), last sentence thereof, which reads as follows: "Instead, they are required, solely because of race, to attend schools where they do not and cannot receive educational advantages, opportunities and facilities equal to those furnished white children." by making a more definite statement therein setting forth the facts upon which plaintiffs base their conclusion as to unequal advantages, opportunities and facilities, for the reason that the present statement is so vague or ambiguous that defendants cannot reasonably be required to frame a responsive pleading thereto.

2. Requiring plaintiffs to amend their amended complaint, paragraph 3 (b), last sentence thereof, which reads as follows:

> "By being compelled to send their children to schools outside the districts wherein they live rather than to schools within said districts, they must bear certain burdens and forego certain advantages, neither of which is suffered by parents of white children situated similarly to children of plaintiffs."

by making a more definite statement therein setting forth the facts upon which plaintiffs base their conclusion that adult plaintiffs must bear certain burdens and forego certain benefits; for the reason that the present statement is so vague and ambiguous that defendants cannot reasonably be required to frame a responsive pleading thereto.

3. Requiring plaintiffs to strike from their amended complaint the following language in paragraph 7 thereof:

> "and in violation of their rights under the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States."

[fol. 9] for the reason that the same is a conclusion and is redundant.

4. Requiring plaintiffs to amend the eighth paragraph of their amended complaint, which reads as follows:

> "The educational opportunities provided by defendants for infant plaintiffs in the separate all-Negro schools are inferior to those provided for white school children similarly situated in violation of the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States."

by making a more definite statement therein setting forth the facts upon which plaintiffs base their conclusion that educational opportunities claimed therein are inferior to those provided for white children; for the reason that the present statement is so vague and ambiguous that defendants cannot reasonably be required to frame a responsive pleading thereto, and further requiring plaintiffs to strike from said paragraph 8, the following language:

> "in violation of the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States."

for the reason that the same is a conclusion and is redundant.

5. Requiring plaintiffs to strike from paragraph 9 of the amended complaint the last sentence thereof which reads as follows:

> "Thus adult plaintiffs are being denied the equal protection of the laws in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States."

for the reason that the same is a conclusion and is redundant.

6. By requiring plaintiffs to amend their amended complaint by striking all of paragraph 10 thereof, which reads as follows:

> "Infant plaintiffs and adult plaintiffs are thereby being wilfully and unlawfully discriminated against by the defendants on account of their race and color, in that infant plaintiffs are compelled to attend schoo outside the school districts in which they live, whi white children similarly situated are not so compelle

ANSWER OF DEFENDANTS TO AMENDED COMPLAINT AS AMENDED IN PARAGRAPH 8 THEREOF—Filed June 7, 1951

1. Defendants admit the allegations stated in paragraphs 4 and 6 of the Amended Complaint, except that defendants allege that the City of Topeka is one school district, as hereinafter set forth. Defendants deny all the allegations stated in Amendments to paragraph 8 of the Amended Complaint, and further deny all the allegations stated in paragraphs 9, 10 and 11 of the Amended Complaint.

2. Defendants admit the allegations stated in paragraph 1 (a) of the Amended Complaint, except defendants deny that the amount in controversy, exclusive of interest and costs, exceeds $3,000.00.

3. Defendants admit the allegations stated in paragraph 2, except defendants deny that infant plaintiffs are denied rights and privileges of enrolling in, attending and receiving instruction in public schools within the district in which they live; and deny that they have denied infant plaintiffs educational opportunities equal to those afforded white children.

4. Defendants allege that the City of Topeka, Kansas, is in and of itself one school district; that acting pursuant to authority vested in it, defendants have designated and defined 22 separate territories within the City of Topeka and in each of said territories have established and maintain a public elementary school, and white children are required to attend the elementary school located in the territory in which they live; that defendants have also established and maintain four separate elementary schools for colored children within said district, and only colored children in the City of Topeka may attend said four schools. [fol. 14] Defendants further allege that the colored school children, including infant plaintiffs, may attend any one of these four schools.

5. Defendants allege that said separate schools are established and maintained pursuant to the laws of the State of Kansas, G. S. 1949, 72-1724, and separate schools are provided only for elementary school children, to-wit, the first six grades.

6. Defendants allege that they have established and maintain junior high schools throughout the City of Topeka and have designated and defined territories for each of said schools; that both colored and white children may attend these schools and are required to attend the junior high school located within the territory in which they live.

7. Defendants allege that transportation facilities are provided for colored school children attending the four colored schools mentioned in paragraph 4 hereof, and said transportation facilities are furnished any colored school child attending elementary schools, upon request; that no transportation is furnished white children by the defendants.

8. Defendants admit the allegations stated in paragraph 3 (b) that adult plaintiffs are citizens of the United States, the State of Kansas, Shawnee County and the City of Topeka, Kansas, and deny the remainder of said paragraph. Defendants further deny that adult plaintiffs are compelled to send their children to schools outside the district wherein they live.

9. Defendants admit the allegations stated in paragraph 3 (a) that infant plaintiffs are citizens of the United States, State of Kansas, Shawnee County and the City of Topeka, Kansas, and that they are among those classified as negroes. [fol. 15] Defendants allege that infant plaintiffs have presented themselves for enrollment and registration in elementary schools for white children but were denied the right to enroll therein. Defendants allege that infant plaintiffs, because of race and color, do not satisfy the requirements for admission to schools for white children and by reason thereof they were denied admission. Defendants deny the remainder of paragraph 3 (a).

10. Defendants allege that they are without knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to the truth of the allegations stated in paragraph 3 (c) of the Amended

BLEED THROUGH

Complaint, or that adult plaintiffs are taxpayers of Shawnee County, the State of Kansas, and the United States, as stated in paragraph 3 (b).

11. Defendants admit the allegations stated in paragraph 5 of the Amended Complaint, but deny that they are governed by General Statutes 1935, and supplements thereto, section 72-1809, for the reason that said statute applies to public schools in cities of the second class and not to public schools in cities of the first class to which class the City of Topeka belongs.

12. Defendants deny the allegations stated in paragraph 7 of the Amended Complaint, and allege that white school children of elementary school age in the City of Topeka are required to go to the elementary schools within the designated boundaries of the territory in which they live, and that these schools are within the school district of the City of Topeka; that infant plaintiffs go to elementary schools within the district in which they live, namely, the school district of the City of Topeka, Kansas, and they may attend any of the colored elementary schools within the City of Topeka, as set forth in paragraph 4 hereof. Defendants further allege that the distance traveled by colored children [fol. 16] in reaching the schools they attend is not on the average greater than the distance white children are required to travel.

Wherefore, Defendants pray that plaintiffs take naught; and that defendants have judgment and costs.

SEPARATE ANSWER OF THE STATE OF KANSAS—Filed June 15, 1951

Comes now the State of Kansas, an intervening defendant, by Edward F. Arn, Governor of said State, and Harold R. Fatzer, the Attorney General thereof, and for its answer to the amended complaint herein alleges as follows:

I

That the amended complaint in said cause fails to state a claim or cause of action against this intervening defendant upon which relief may be granted to the plaintiffs.

II

This intervening defendant admits the allegations contained in paragraph 1 of the amended complaint except that it denies the amount in controversy exceeds, exclusive of interest and costs, the sum or value of $3,000.00.

III

This intervening defendant admits the allegations contained in paragraph 2 (a) of the amended complaint except that it expressly denies Chapter 72-1724 of the General Statutes of Kansas, 1935 (1949), is unconstitutional. This defendant is without knowledge or information to either admit or deny the truth or the allegations contained in paragraph 2 (b), (c), and paragraph 3 (a), (b) of the amended complaint.

[fol. 18] IV

This defendant admits the allegations contained in paragraphs 4 and 5 of the amended complaint, but denies that the defendant, Board of Education of Topeka, Shawnee County, Kansas, is governed by the General Statutes of Kansas, 1935, and supplements thereto, Section 72-1809, for the reason that said statute has no application to pub-

[fol. 21] COLLOQUY BETWEEN COURT AND COUNSEL

Judge Mellott: Do you have the appearances, Mr. Reporter?

The Reporter: Yes, Your Honor.

Judge Huxman: Gentlemen, the purpose of this session this morning is to hold a pre-trial conference to see whether we can simplify the matters and what can be agreed to before we go to trial next Monday.

Judge Mellott has called my attention to Rule 16. It provides for conference to simplify the issues, whether there is any necessity for amendments to the pleadings and to inquire into the possibility of obtaining admissions of fact concerning which there can be no dispute, limitation of the number of expert witnesses, the advisability of a preliminary reference of the issues to a master for findings and any such other matters as may simplify the issues at the time of the trial.

All the parties have entered—are in court and have filed pleadings; that is true of the State of Kansas, is it not?

Mr. McQueary: It is, Your Honor.

Judge Huxman: Is there a desire on the part of anybody to amend the pleadings in any manner; any necessity for amendment of pleadings?

BLEED THROUGH

Mr. Charles Scott: Yes, if the Court please. We have one amendment we desire to make.

[fol. 22] Judge Mellott: To what paragraph?

Mr. Charles Scott: Paragraph 5, sub-paragraph (a) of the plaintiffs' amended complaint.

Mr. Goodell: What was that again?

Mr. Charles Scott: Paragraph 5, sub-paragraph (a).

Judge Huxman: Paragraph 5 what?

Mr. Charles Scott: Paragraph 5(a).

Judge Mellott: Let me orient myself and Judge Huxman. Did you file a complete amended complaint?

Mr. Charles Scott: No, sir.

Judge Mellott: You filed an original complaint.

Mr. Charles Scott: And an amended complaint and—— Judge Mellott: And then in the amended complaint—there was an amendment to the amended complaint.

Mr. Goodell: I interpret that they did file——

Judge Mellott: You did file an amended complaint on March 22nd, didn't you?

Mr. Charles Scott: Yes.

Judge Mellott: The motion to make more definite was addressed to that amended complaint.

[fol. 23] Mr. Charles Scott: That is correct.

Judge Mellott: And then you filed an amendment to the amended complaint, under date of May 29th, did you not?

Mr. Charles Scott: That is correct, sir.

Judge Huxman: What do you desire presently?

Mr. Charles Scott: We desire to correct the statute of 72-1809 of the General Statutes of 1935 and the supplements thereto.

Judge Mellott: Let me get this in the pleading here. You are now talking about your original amended complaint, aren't you?

Mr. Charles Scott: The original amended complaint.

Judge Mellott: And you say you want to refer to paragraph 5 of that.

Mr. Charles Scott: 5(a).

Judge Mellott: 5(a). Your amendment is what; you want to make reference to the General Statutes of '49 instead of 1935, is that what you are saying?

Mr. Charles Scott: We also want to make reference to the General Statutes of 1949 and also strike therefrom Section 72-1809 and insert therein 72-1724.

Judge Mellott: 72-1724.

Mr. Charles Scott: That is correct.

[fol. 24] Judge Mellott: And does that read, then, that that is the General Statutes of Kansas for 1949?

Mr. Charles Scott: That is correct.

Judge Mellott: You wish to leave out the words, "and supplements thereto."

Mr. Charles Scott: Yes, we can take that out, that's true.

Judge Mellott: Let me see if I understand what you are doing. Paragraph 5(a), as amended, now reads: "Defendant, Board of Education, is under a duty to enforce the school laws of the State of Kansas (General Statutes of Kansas, 1949, Section 72-1724)", is that the amendment you are making?

Mr. Charles Scott: That is correct, sir.

Judge Mellott: Any other amendments?

Mr. Charles Scott: That is all we have.

Judge Huxman: Any objections to that? No objections; the amendment will be——

Mr. Goodell: If I understand his point, he cited in his amended complaint, which he now desires to correct, a statute which applies to cities of second class, erroneously when he intended to use—so we have no objection.

Judge Huxman: All right; the amendment will be ordered.

Judge Mellott: The Court will make the amendment by [fol. 25] interlineation.

Judge Huxman: Any other amendment to the pleadings?

Mr. Goodell: We have none, Your Honor.

Judge Huxman: No further amendments to any of the pleadings.

Mr. Bledsoe: If the Court please, at this time I would like to inform the Court we have two attorneys who are interested in this case with the plaintiffs, and they are here now, and I would like to present them to the Court at this time.

Judge Huxman: I will ask Judge Mellott to handle that because he knows how that matter is handled.

Judge Mellott: Very well. You may introduce them, if you will, and tell me who they are.

BLEED THROUGH

Mr. Bledsoe: They would like to be admitted for the purpose of this case only.

Judge Mellott: Present them.

Mr. Bledsoe: If the Court please, this gentleman here is Robert Carter, from New York. This, gentlemen, is Judge Huxman of the Tenth Circuit Court of Appeals; the gentleman over here is Jack Greenberg, of New York, and this is Judge Mellott of the District of Kansas Federal Court.

Judge Mellott: Are these gentlemen members of the bar?

[fol. 26] Mr. Bledsoe: They are.

Judge Mellott: In what state?

Mr. Bledsoe: New York.

Judge Mellott: In good standing?

Mr. Bledsoe: They are.

Judge Mellott: And are they admitted to practice in federal courts and courts such as this in their home jurisdiction?

Mr. Bledsoe: They are.

Judge Mellott: Never been disbarred. You vouch for them.

Mr. Bledsoe: I do.

Judge Mellott: Without further formality, then, they will be permitted to appear as counsel, along with the other gentlemen who presently appear as counsel in this case. Thank you, gentlemen; you may be seated.

Judge Huxman: Unless there is something else preliminary, we might——

Mr. Carter: Your Honor, if I may, I would like to raise one point. I don't think an amendment would be necessary to our pleadings, but we erroneously refer to school districts in Topeka, where it should be "territories", and we were going to make a stipulation with the defendants that they are territories rather than districts—and there is one school district.

[fol. 27] Judge Huxman: I think that is covered.

Mr. Carter: I just want to be sure.

Judge Mellott: I suppose, if necessary, for all proper purposes in this case, the Court can consider that where you use the word "district" in your pleading, that really what you are referring to is "territories." I believe I suggested that at an earlier proceeding here. It was my understanding Topeka was one school district, so you were referring to territories.

Judge Huxman: There is one other matter that might come up during the trial—at least I think the Court might want to make inquiry—will either or any of the parties to this litigation want to use expert witnesses?

Mr. Carter: Well, Your Honor——

Judge Huxman: For what purpose?

Mr. Carter: We want to use expert witnesses for the general purpose of showing that the segregation, which is the issue in the case, the segregation of the plaintiffs and of the class they represent in the negro schools is in fact a denial to them of their right to equal educational opportunities, that they are not getting equal educational opportunities by virtue of that. That is the purpose of our expert testimony.

Judge Huxman: Will there be any opposition to expert witnesses?

Judge Huxman: —the use of expert witnesses by the plaintiffs?

Mr. Goodell: The way the question was stated, we will certainly object to that. We think that is a question of law. I, of course, don't know what turn it will take.

Judge Huxman: Well, the question of whether such testimony is competent, does not need to be decided at this time. The purpose of this inquiry is to ascertain how many such witnesses you will request and whether there shall be a limit. How many witnesses do you gentlemen desire on that question, assuming that the Court rules it is competent.

Mr. Carter: Well, Your Honor, I think that we were not certain of the exact number but approximately nine. We have approximately nine or ten people who we want to call who have made studies of this.

Judge Huxman: Well, the Court feels that nine witnesses on that one issue is too many witnesses. In other words, the issue is whether segregation itself, I presume, is not a denial of due process, irrespective of whether everything else is equal, to that furnished in the white schools, is that not your general contention?

Mr. Carter: Yes, sir.

Judge Huxman: Because of the effect it has upon the

BLEED THROUGH

[fol. 29] mind, upon the student, upon his outlook; I presume that would be your position.

Mr. Carter: That is absolutely correct, Your Honor.

Judge Huxman: Could nine witnesses give different testimony, or would their testimony be largely the same?

Mr. Carter: I doubt that, Your Honor. Our testimony will not be cumulative. Our purpose of getting these people was in order to give a rounded picture with respect to the subject that we have just raised. Now, we will have some witnesses who will testify as to tangible and physical inequalities also among those people, so that I think that it would be a great hardship to us if we were limited. We have no intention of merely bringing on witnesses to be cumulative.

Judge Mellott: That is the thing the Court thinks it should avoid. We shouldn't hear nine witnesses testify cumulatively even as experts, it seems to me, on the same thing.

Mr. Carter: I agree, but, Your Honor, we have no—we are not going to have duplication. Each of the people that we are asking to come here to testify will handle a different phase of this.

Judge Mellott: Then we should not limit you if that is what you expect to do.

[fol. 30] Judge Huxman: The Court feels this way, that it's difficult for it at this time to see where nine witnesses could testify on this one subject, to nine different sets of facts, unrelated facts, but you may be right; we do not intend to deny you the right to fully present your case. The Court, however, feels that after it has heard five witnesses, expert witnesses, if the Court then feels that the witnesses that you are offering thereafter are merely duplicating what has been said, an objection to their testimony on that ground will be sustained. If, on the other hand, the testimony is clearly different from what has been given, why you then should have the right to present your nine witnesses. But at the end of five, the Court will certainly scrutinize the testimony of the other four quite carefully to see whether it is duplication or additional testimony.

Mr. Carter: All right, sir.

Judge Huxman: Do you gentlemen then stipulate that, in any event, the expert witnesses which you request will be limited in number to nine.

Mr. Carter: Your Honor, frankly, our difficulty in making any stipulation like that is that Mr. Greenberg and I have just gotten here from New York this morning about——

Judge Huxman: This isn't the first case of this kind you were in. You were in the South Carolina case, weren't [fol. 31] you?

Mr. Carter: Yes, sir; but the thing is we haven't really had an opportunity to go over this. I would not want to make that stipulation. What I will say and what Your Honor has ruled is that after five, you will scrutinize whatever testimony we present for duplication, and we will certainly attempt to avoid that, but I wouldn't want to say that we would only have nine.

Judge Huxman: That was your statement in response.

Mr. Carter: I said approximately; I didn't want to be tied down to that number at all.

Judge Mellott: How much leeway do you want?

Mr. Carter: Well, I frankly think that we won't have more than nine, but I just would prefer not to be tied down. I am not going to, believe me, Your Honor, we are not going to parade a lot of witnesses here merely to keep you tied down.

Mr. Goodell: It would be under ninety, wouldn't it?

Mr. Carter: It will be under fifteen.

Mr. Goodell: Nine to ninety.

Judge Huxman: It would be the order of the Court that expert witnesses on behalf of the plaintiff, in the first [fol. 32] instance, will be limited to five, but if at that point the plaintiffs have additional witnesses which they feel have testimony to offer which has not been covered by these five, they will not be denied the right to present that testimony, is that correct, judge?

Judge Mellott: Yes, at this time, I think.

Judge Huxman: But that after five have been heard, the Court will reserve the right to reject any further evidence if it should feel that the evidence that is being offered is cumulative and not additional to what the first five have testified, is that fair to you boys?

In view of the fact that there has been a statement that plaintiffs will offer expert witnesses on this subject, assuming that the testimony will be received, will the defendants, or any of them, want to on their part offer expert testimony along this same line?

Mr. Goodell: Well, I am a little at a handicap of knowing exactly what their line is. They mention there is to be testimony from experts, as I understood it, on some physical facts which, of course, I don't know what they are referring to except I take it to mean that inferiority to—as to some —something relating to the school system and, of course, if that comes up, we will probably want to rebut that, not with experts, I don't think.

[fol. 33] Judge Huxman: Judge Mellott——

Mr. Goodell: As to the other phase which I understand is the psychological aspect and sociological, until I have heard their testimony, I am at a loss to know whether we will want to rebut it or attempt to rebut it.

Judge Mellott: Well, would it not be proper if the Court thought in terms of the same basic premise that in the event you do decide to offer experts rebutting the testimony of the plaintiffs' experts, that a limitation somewhat along the line suggested by Judge Huxman to the plaintiff should, likewise, apply to you.

Mr. Goodell: I certainly think so.

Judge Huxman: All right; that will be the order of the Court at this time.

Now, is there anything else, gentlemen, as to preliminary matters that we want to discuss before we go into these requests for admissions. Anything else that might be helpful in shaping the issues, shortening this trial.

I may state for myself, as a member of this court, that it would certainly be my purpose to afford the parties a full and complete hearing and an opportunity to present the issues fully and completely but, on the other hand, I would be very loathe to just permit the introduction of a great mass of testimony for any purpose whatever that has no bearing upon the issues; it merely prolongs and drags out [fol. 34] this trial.

Anything else preliminary? Do you care to say anything more?

Judge Mellott: I am quite sure Judge Hill and I concur entirely as to what you have just said, though my authority, of course, to speak is only to speak for myself.

Judge Huxman: In a preliminary conference, Judge

Mellott, to bring you up to date, purely informal, with attorneys for the plaintiffs and the defendants, I suggested that, as a preliminary to this pre-trial conference, each side prepare requested admissions of fact and serve them on the other side.

Judge Mellott: I am sure that was quite helpful.

Judge Huxman: We have that here this morning and, if there is nothing further, suppose, gentlemen, we proceed to see how many of these requests we can agree upon.

We will take up the defendants' requests for stipulations first.

No. 1 is a request for an agreement that the City of Topeka, Kansas, constitutes one school district.

Mr. Carter: We agree.

Judge Huxman: That is agreed to.

Judge Mellott: Thank you, gentlemen.

[fol. 35] Judge Huxman: Request No. 2:

"That defendants have designated within the City of Topeka, Kansas, eighteen territories and in each of these territories have established and maintain a public elementary school for white children only; in addition thereto defendants have established and maintain in the City of Topeka, Kansas, four separate elementary schools for colored children and attendance at these four schools is restricted to colored children. Exhibit A, which is made a part hereof by reference, is a map of the City of Topeka and adjacent territories attached to Topeka School District for school purposes only. Said Exhibit A correctly designates the school territory for white schools for the City of Topeka, Kansas. Said map also designates the four colored schools, which are Buchanan, McKinley, Monroe and Washington. Colored school children in the City of Topeka, Kansas, may attend any one of these four colored schools, and the choice of schools is made by the colored school children or their parents. The territory colored blue on Exhibit A represents areas not within the City of Topeka except for school purposes, and children residing in said areas attend schools in the City of Topeka, Kansas."

Now, before you make any request, Judge Mellott has not seen Exhibit "A". As a preliminary question, may I ask, Mr. Goodell, who prepared that exhibit?

BLEED THROUGH

[fol. 36] Mr. Goodell: The clerk of the Topeka Board of Education.

Judge Huxman: Do you vouch for its territorial correctness and integrity?

Mr. Goodell: Absolutely.

Judge Huxman: All right. With that preliminary statement, is there any objection to the admission requested in request No. 2?

Mr. Carter: Well, Your Honor, this is the first—I think we have no objection on Exhibit "A", but going over on to page 2—about the fifth line from the top——

Mr. Carter: "and the choice of schools is made by the colored school children or their parents." I should think we have to get more information on that before we could agree. With that exception, we will agree.

Mr. Goodell: For clarity, what is meant there, of course, is choice of which of the four colored schools. It doesn't mean to say——

Mr. Carter: It is a question in our minds as to whether that is true.

Judge Huxman: Do you have testimony to the effect that that is not true?

Mr. Carter: We may.

[fol. 37] Judge Huxman: You may.

Mr. Carter: Yes, sir.

Judge Huxman: Well, do you have reasons to believe that it is not true?

Mr. Carter: Well, the only thing I can say at this time, Your Honor, is that up to—as far as this is concerned, we have to know—we would have to make a little further investigation on this ourselves. We might stipulate, agree, that this is true by Monday, but I don't think we can do it today.

Judge Huxman: All right. I just feel this way, that there ought to be a perfect willingness on the part of both parties to freely and frankly agree to facts concerning which there just can't be any dispute. Now, if there is a question about a fact, that should not be agreed to, of course, but you have local colored counsel here who no doubt went to schools here, these segregated schools.

Mr. Carter: That is——

Judge Huxman: Do you agree to the request with the exception of that portion starting—with this exception: "Colored school children in the City of Topeka, Kansas, may attend any one of these four colored schools, and the choice of schools is made by the colored school children or their parents."

Mr. Carter: All we reject is of the choice.

[fol. 38] Judge Huxman: Do you agree to everything but that?

Mr. Carter: We agree with the first part of the statement. All we don't know about is the choice.

Judge Huxman: I am just taking the one sentence. I don't like to divide a sentence. You want to reserve the agreement to that until Monday.

Mr. Carter: Yes, sir.

Judge Huxman: And, in the meantime, you will make an investigation and if you find that that is a fact——

Mr. Carter: We will agree to it.

Judge Huxman: Mr. Scott, you have been a resident of Topeka all your life.

Mr. Charles Scott: Yes, sir.

Judge Huxman: Are you able to say whether that is or is not a fact as the schools are administered.

Mr. Charles Scott: Qualified, Your Honor. We are allowed to go to the schools that are closest to our home. Now, whether or not the school board has any control over that or not, I don't know, but, as a practical matter, naturally, the colored students go to the school closest to their home.

Judge Huxman: I tell you what I wish you would do with your New York counsel. I wish you would have a confer[fol. 39] ence with the members of the school board between now and Monday and ask them if a colored student wants to attend any one of these four schools whether there is any restriction upon his right to do so.

Mr. Charles Scott: I will do that, Your Honor.

Judge Huxman: And then come in Monday morning——

Mr. Goodell: Of course, my information came from the board and the administrative officers on all these matters.

Judge Huxman: They should have the right to get that information themselves.

BLEED THROUGH

It is agreed, then, that request for admission No. 2 is argeed to with the exception of that portion which has just been read by the Court and, as to that portion, inquiry will be made by Monday and a statement by counsel for plaintiffs will be made then as to whether they agree to that portion which is presently eliminated.

We will take up No. 3:

"That the same curriculum is used in the elementary colored schools in the City of Topeka, Kansas, as is used in the elementary white schools in said city."

Mr. Carter: After conference, Your Honor, we cannot stipulate to that.

[fol. 40] Judge Huxman: Do you claim that that is not so?

Mr. Carter: We would change in the first sentence where it reads, "That the same curricula is used", we would change that to "prescribed" as long as curricula is understood to mean courses of study.

Judge Huxman: That is what the curricula means, isn't it, courses of study.

Mr. Goodell: That is what I intended by it.

Mr. Carter: I am not sure.

Judge Huxman: Do you have a different meaning of curricula?

Mr. Carter: Yes, sir.

Judge Huxman: Is there any objection to the elimination of the word "curricula" and the substitution of the "studies are used"?

Mr. Carter: "Prescribed" is what we want to use.

Judge Huxman: That wouldn't be any admission. The question is, is it actually used, that is the test.

Mr. Carter: We are advised that that is not true, Your Honor.

Judge Huxman: How?

[fol. 41] Mr. Carter: We at this table don't feel that we can stipulate to that at this time.

Judge Huxman: Well, do you intend to offer evidence to show that that is not so?

Mr. Carter: Yes, sir.

Judge Huxman: In what respect do you contend that there is a difference?

Mr. Carter: Well, there are several things that I have right now at my fingertips that I can indicate. One is that there is a difference in terms of the special teachers and the special—there are special teachers that are used at the White schools. No special teachers or special courses for certain classes of the student body are at the Negro School.

Judge Huxman: The teachers have nothing to do with the courses of study?

Mr. Carter: Yes, sir. They have set up, as we understand it, Your Honor, set up at the White school a special course of study for children who are somewhat retarded who are not able to come up to the part of their class. Now, no such course is available at the Negro school. We also have a question right now as to whether even though the same courses of study are prescribed, and we think that we have evidence to show that it is not used, that this is not followed out at the Negro school generally.

[fol. 42] Judge Huxman: Mr. Goodell, what do you say with regard to the statement that special courses prescribed in white schools for sub-normal children are not in colored schools?

Mr. Goodell: I don't think that is curricula that is special —that comes under a heading later in our brief about special services which they cover in paragraph 8, which I don't think is embraced in the question of curricula.

Judge Mellott: I am wondering if you gentlemen perhaps are in dispute primarily about the definition of the word "curricula." I wonder if that is your difficulty.

Mr. Goodell: I think—my interpretation of it and the use I intended is the—as meaning the subjects taught, programs used in the school and the subjects taught, courses of study.

Judge Mellott: Well, do you wish to rephrase it so that it does limit it to those particular terms? Maybe your adversary will agree if you rephrase it.

Mr. Goodell: I am willing to change it, Your Honor, by striking out the word "curricula" and substituting therefor "that the same course of study"—"courses of study".

Judge Mellott: I suggest that counsel for the plaintiff give attention to what is being said.

[fol. 43] Mr. Carter: Yes, sir.

Judge Huxman: He is suggesting that perhaps a change in the word "curricula" might make this understandable so you do agree upon its meaning and perhaps get closer to a stipulation.

Mr. Goodell: "That the same course of study is used in the elementary colored schools in the City of Topeka as is used in the elementary white schools." It will read, Your Honor, my suggested amendment.

Judge Huxman: Also keep in mind, gentlemen, that under Mr. Goodell's explanation this special matter which you mentioned for abnormal children is not meant to be included in here, and the agreement to this stipulation would not bar you from showing that some special services are rendered to white children that are not rendered to colored children. With that statement, are you willing to agree with this?

Mr. Charles Scott: At this time, Your Honor, I don't think we are inclined to accept it.

Judge Mellott: Your associates think they are. They say if you limit it to simply saying that the same course of study is used, that they don't have any objection.

Mr. Charles Scott: Well, this is the reason, Your Honor: We have examined a greater portion of the curricula, as prescribed by the school board, and we have found that [fol. 44] there are some differences, certain course of studies are offered in some schools and are not offered in some of the colored schools, and so I don't think we are inclined to accept it on those basis.

Judge Huxman: Can you name a specific instance?

Mr. Charles Scott: Yes, sir.

Judge Huxman: All right, let's have it.

Mr. Charles Scott: They have a course entitled "Literature Appreciation" that is offered in the fifth and sixth grades in several of the white schools, and it is not offered in one or two of the colored schools. Then you have——

Judge Huxman: Is that shown by the exhibits?

Mr. Charles Scott: Yes, sir.

Judge Huxman: All right. What would you say to this: Would you agree that the courses of study as outlined in these exhibits—what are the exhibits?

Mr. Charles Scott: If the Court please, now they label——

Judge Huxman: Are the courses of studies that are used.

Mr. Charles Scott: They call it the school program, but it appears to be the course of study.

[fol. 45] Judge Huxman: That is quibbling about words, isn't it?

Mr. Charles Scott: Well——

Mr. Goodell: I am willing to limit that again. I am not familiar with that matter he points out—to have it read, "That the same course of study required by the Kansas"—by law—"by the Kansas statute is given." I think what he is talking about is some extra-curricular subject that some teachers of their own volition give, like outside reading, reference texts, and so forth, rather than a prescribed course of study.

Mr. Charles Scott: No, I beg to differ with counsel. This is prescribed by the school board and sent down.

Mr. Goodell: I am talking about what the state law requires to be taught in our Kansas elementary public school system.

(Colloquy was here had between counsel off the record.)

Mr. Goodell: If we are going to have a lawsuit here and pursue factual inquiry as to—as to school by school, of which there are twenty-two, we will be chasing down each textbook for outside reading that Miss Jones may prescribe at Randolph which Miss Baker at another school doesn't like, and she prescribes another text for outside [fol. 46] reading. Suppose they are taking history; one likes this for outside reading and another teacher likes another. That will frequently occur.

Judge Mellott: Do you have a printed course of study?

Mr. Goodell: Absolutely.

Judge Mellott: Do you have one?

Mr. Goodell: I have it attached as an exhibit here. And what I meant to convey and what I mean by this stipulation and will reframe it——

Judge Mellott: Where is it attached?

Mr. Brewster: Exhibit "F".

Mr. Goodell: That the course of study required by our Kansas statute is followed in all of the schools without any distinction between the white and colored elementary schools.

BLEED THROUGH

(Colloquy was here had between counsel off the record.)

Judge Huxman: Shall we then eliminate request No. 3?

Mr. Goodell: Let's pass that, Your Honor.

Judge Huxman: We will pass request No. 3 and take up No. 4:

"That the same school books are used in the elementary colored schools in the City of Topeka, Kansas, as are used in [fol. 47] the elementary white schools in said city."

Is that not related to 3 and also covered by your exhibits?

Mr. Goodell: Yes.

Judge Huxman: Shall we pass it?

Mr. Goodell: Yes, that is satisfactory.

Mr. Carter: Your Honor, we are having one of our expert witnesses, that is going to be a librarian, who is at the present time checking the holdings of all the schools.

Judge Huxman: Is what?

Mr. Carter: The holdings, the library holdings of all of the schools, and we therefore are not—we can't——

Judge Huxman: We passed 4.

Mr. Goodell: I would like to amend, in view of his remarks, I would like to amend that to read, "The same textbooks"—"school textbooks"—so that it doesn't——

Judge Huxman: All right, that will be permitted.

Judge Mellott: Do you agree that the same textbooks are used?

Mr. Carter: I think we will agree.

Judge Mellott: Very well.

Judge Huxman: Did you, Mr. Reporter, get request No. [fol. 48] 4, as amended?

The Reporter: Yes, Your Honor.

Judge Huxman: We will take No. 5:

"That each of the four colored elementary schools in the City of Topeka, Kansas, is situated in neighborhoods where the population is predominantly colored."

Mr. John Scott: That is agreeable, Your Honor.

Judge Huxman: That is agreed to.

Judge Huxman: No. 6:

"That transportation to and from school is furnished colored children in the elementary schools of the City of Topeka, Kansas, without cost to said children or their parents. No such transportation is furnished white children in the elementary schools of the City of Topeka."

It would seem to me that is either a fact or isn't a fact.

Mr. Charles Scott: We will agree to that.

Judge Huxman: All right. No. 6 is agreed to.

No. 7:

"That the same services are offered to colored and white elementary schools by the school authorities of the City of Topeka, Kansas, except in the case of transportation, as [fol. 49] set out in the preceding paragraph hereof."

Now, before you speak on that, I would like to ask a preliminary question: I am not sure that I understand, Mr. Goodell, what you mean by the "same services."

Mr. Goddell: I mean services like supervised play of the children at recess and noon period; I mean services of public health, nursing, which is furnished the elementary schools, both white and colored alike; I mean services that are entailed in departmental heads calling on the elementary school system, such as music department, and giving supervision and advice to the teachers. That is what I mean.

Judge Huxman: Is there anything else that you include in services?

Mr. Goodell: No, that is what I mean.

Judge Huxman: All right. And your request, requested admission, that these services which you have mentioned are furnished both in the colored schools and in the white schools.

Mr. Goodell: That is correct.

Mr. John Scott: We don't accept that, if Your Honor please. I think that is a little too indefinite; we need a little more definite and certain——

Judge Huxman: That is the reason I asked you to state [fol. 50] specifically the kind of services he had in mind.

Mr. John Scott: Yes, Your Honor, I understand that, but, as it stands in the stipulation at the present time, we wouldn't have a way of knowing.

Judge Huxman: The stipulation as it reads in the printed record isn't going to be the record. The record that is made is as modified by the statements of Mr. Goodell. They are the ones that go into the record.

BLEED THROUGH

All right; is that agreed to, then?

Mr. Carter: That is agreeable, Your Honor.

Judge Huxman: That is agreeable.

Judge Mellott: Well, are there any other services that either side thinks should be incorporated. Now, I have in my mind some three or four services. Now, in order to make that complete, do you wish to give us a more detailed or do you wish to add anything to the services which Mr. Goodell has referred to?

Mr. Carter: No, sir. We have one item that I think I spoke of before. I think that Mr. Goodell indicated that it was a service, but he doesn't include that in his special statements. The statement is satisfactory to us.

Judge Mellott: The word "services" is rather big and broad and all-inclusive.

Judge Huxman: Of course, it—all right, that is agreed [fol. 51] to, then, as modified by the explanation; the furnishing of services as stated is agreed to.

We will take up No. 8:

"That the distance traveled by colored children in reaching the schools they attend is not on the average greater than the distance white children are required to travel to reach the schools they attend."

Mr. Carter: Well, Your Honor, I don't think we want to stipulate on this. I don't think it has anything to do with the case. I think it's irrelevant.

Mr. Goodell: If the Court please, on that point, it is merely a mathematical proposition. That map, Exhibit "A", shows the whole City of Topeka and territory outside of the city is in blue, which is in Topeka for school purposes. We have marked on the map, Exhibit "A", each school territory. It shows, of course, the physical facts of distances which appear on this city map and can be computed. Children, in other words, living, for example—taking Exhibit "A"—in the blue territory over here in the corner (indicating) their school that they would have to go to, white children, would be Randolph, and all of that. Of course the matter of various school distances are written in on the map—are identified. Of course to get at it any more accurately, which would be almost an intolerable job, would be to get each child that went to the city schools and get the [fol. 52] actual distance travelled divided by the number of children, and then you would get the average, and then get each colored child and get the actual distance divided by number of children, and then you would have the average.

Judge Huxman: Mr. Goodell, I doubt whether the Court would want that kind of a stipulation agreed to. That might be mathematically correct when you take an outlying territory. Now, to reach that result, you take territory that is not in the city limits and that——

Mr. Goodell: I have done some computing with a ruler, and I have taken the school population of the various schools, and I have taken distances in various different territories, and I know that as a matter of fact, it's a conservative statement, it's on the conservative side.

Judge Huxman: Well, now you may be right, but I wouldn't want this, as far as I am concerned; I wouldn't be content to have it established by stipulation that you can have four schools in the City of Topeka for one group of people and eighteen for another in that same territorial limit and yet those in the four schools would not be required to travel greater distances than the children that have eighteen schools. Now maybe it's a fact, I don't know.

Mr. Goodell: Keep in mind, Your Honor, that the colored schools have been, and that is covered by prior stipulation which is admitted, are located in neighborhoods in each case [fol. 53] which are predominantly colored neighborhoods; consequently, you don't have a situation in the case of where four colored schools have children living blocks—thirty some blocks—away from the nearest school which we—which does obtain in the case of many of our white schools—several of them—because of the population trends in the southwest part of our city in the last few years, particularly since the war. We have had great population trends out toward the west and southwest which has caused the territory to be taken in for school purposes and, in some cases, annexed territory, and has brought about that situation.

Furthermore, I—except for paragraph 8, when they make that as one of their grounds for inequality, is the matter of distance travelled or inaccessibility of their schools. I can't see where that is too important because we do transport them in every case where they ask to be transported.

Judge Huxman: Now that is a conclusion which flows from what is done, and you might be right on that, but the fact is a different thing, and Judge Mellott and I are in agreement that the Court does not want the stipulation as an admitted fact in this case.

Mr. Goodell: Would it add anything to it for me to have some witness get on the stand and testify as to just what the map shows and testify that the children do come from [fol. 54] the territories as shown by the map, to the various schools. Now, to make anything——

Judge Huxman: Speaking for myself alone, Mr. Goodell, as I get—if I understand the effect of what you are trying to say, is that the average distances travelled by the white children are as great as the average distance travelled by the colored children.

Mr. Goodell: That's right.

Judge Huxman: I wouldn't be impressed with that in the case at all. If the fact remained that a colored child over here had to travel two miles and a number of colored children had to travel two miles by virtue of the fact that there weren't so many of them and you had an outlying district of white children which brought their average travelled distance to as great as the colored children had to travel, I still think it might be an imposition upon a colored child if it had to travel two miles whereas a white child did not have to travel two miles.

Mr. Goodell: We will have an isolated case. When I talk about travel, I say again, in the stipulations, have already been admitted on that; that they are furnished transportation so that travel doesn't seem to me as a very significant issue.

Judge Huxman: That is a different matter.

Mr. Goodell: But, be that as it may, you still have iso- [fol. 55] lated cases where a colored child may go twenty-four blocks by bus.

Judge Huxman: The Court is of the view that the request for stipulation No. 8 might be eliminated, so we might as well pass it for the time being.

Mr. Goodell: As I understand the Court, I have to prove the distance all the white children go to school and the distance the colored children go to school, is that my understanding, is that correct? We would be here for days and days on that.

Judge Mellott: You have your map here, and I think you can demonstrate—you already have indicated what you think your demonstration would consist of. What Judge Huxman, as I understand, is suggesting, and I am in accord with his views, is a mere mathematical calculation out of which flows an average allocated in one instance to the colored pupils and in another instance to the white pupils, wouldn't be particularly helpful.

Mr. Goodell: Of course there is inequality within the white structure. You have some white kids living next door and half a block away from the schoolhouse and others living thirty-six blocks away. To cure that we would have to have a schoolhouse on every corner. There always has to be that disparity.

Judge Huxman: But, as Judge Mellott has just stated, [fol. 56] an average distance travelled arrived upon the composite of a great number, has very little weight with me.

Mr. Goodell: I admit that fallacies in it, of course. I have to prove that because they have injected that as an issue.

Judge Huxman: They might be willing to concede that you having arrived at this by average, that the total distance travelled by all the white children and the total distance travelled by the colored children would produce this result; that is a different matter. But, anyhow, it wouldn't take you very long to prove that, how this computation was arrived at.

Mr. Goodell: Your Honor, I am not trying to say that I proved that on a school attendance record. I took—arbitrarily—distances and assume there would be children going to school in some of their territory. Now, that was an assumption. To get at that on a factual basis, I would have to get the school attendance from each and every one of these schools, look up the records where each kid lives, put those altogether, those children and distances, divided by the number of children to get at the average distance, and I would be all summer doing that.

BLEED THROUGH

Judge Mellott: I don't think we would ever ask you to do that or permit you to do it.

Judge Huxman: Request No. 8 is omitted.

[fol. 57] Mr. Brewster: One statement, judge. Plaintiffs' objection to this stipulation was the fact that distance travelled was immaterial. If that is what he meant, are you willing to stipulate, then, that the distance the students are required to travel is not an issue in the lawsuit.

Mr. Carter: No; I didn't say that. I said that the stipulation was immaterial.

Judge Huxman: No use or purpose would be served by pursuing the inquiry further because the Court itself has eliminated request No. 8.

Mr. Brewster: The point was——

Judge Huxman: We will come to No. 9:

"That Exhibits B-1 to B-22, inclusive, attached hereto and made a part hereof, are correct compilations for each of the elementary public schools in the City of Topeka, Kansas, and correctly state for the 1950-1951 school period the following as to each school designated:

"1. Name of elementary school.

"2. Name of principal.

"3. Class-room units.

"4. Enrollment.

"5. Kindergarten units.

"6. Kindergarten enrollment.

"7. Names of teachers, grades taught, enrollment for each grade, and average daily attendance."

[fol. 58] Now, before we go to that, I think I would like to clear up in my mind a matter that is somewhat cloudy. I want to be sure that I understand these designations. "SP" means what?

Mr. Goodell: Special.

Judge Huxman: Special teacher. What does "K" mean?

Mr. Goodell: Kindergarten.

Judge Huxman: And the figures appearing after "K" is the number of kindergarten students, or what is that? For instance, in Buchanan, you have this: "Teacher, SP K 1 1-2 2 2-3".

Judge Mellott: I suppose those are first grades.

(Colloquy was here had between Court and Counsel off the record.)

Judge Mellott: Do you stipulate, gentlemen, that these exhibits are correct and reflect those various matters?

Mr. Charles Scott: If the Court please, we agree to everything. I think there is a typographical error in the name of Mildred Starnes, as appears on Exhibit "B-1." The name should be changed to Myrtle. It isn't material.

Judge Mellott: Any correction such as that is not very material, but if you want them corrected—— [fol. 59] Judge Huxman: Do plaintiffs agree to request for admissions as contained in No. 9, then.

Mr. Carter: Yes, sir.

Judge Huxman: No. 9 is agreed to.

No. 10:

"That Exhibits C-1 to C-22 inclusive, attached hereto and made a part hereof, are correct compilations for each of the elementary public schools in the City of Topeka, Kansas, and correctly state for the 1950-1951 school period the following as to each school designated:

"1. Name of teacher or principal.

"2. Total service.

"3. Degree or hours credit.

"4. 1950-1951 salary.

"5. 1951-1952 salary."

Is there any objection to agreeing to that?

Mr. Charles Scott: No, sir.

Judge Huxman: All right. Request No. 10 is agreed to in toto.

No. 11:

"That in arriving at the salary to be paid teachers in the elementary public schools of Topeka, Kansas, the determining factors are the same for colored teachers as for white teachers, and the application of these factors is the [fol. 60] same."

Mr. Carter: Well, Your Honor, we can't say that this is a fact. We don't think it's important.

Judge Huxman: That's rather a conclusion, isn't it?

Mr. Goodell: Maybe it is, except what is meant by it, the clear implication of it, what I meant to say, if it can be made plainer, I will amend it to say it. No distinction is made in the matter of payment of salaries between white and colored teachers.

BLEED THROUGH

Judge Huxman: Well, Mr. Goodell——

Mr. Goodell: ——because of color.

Judge Huxman: The Court is of the view that No. 11 perhaps would serve no useful purpose if agreed to, and it is of such a nature that the plaintiffs perhaps shouldn't be required to agree to it. I doubt if they make an issue of that.

Mr. Goodell: If the Court please——

Judge Mellott: They have covered it in the preceding paragraph admitting what the salaries are, haven't they?

Mr. Goodell: That admits salaries, yes. That shows the physical facts of what the salaries being paid are, yes.

[fol. 61] Judge Huxman: What is it you state?

Mr. Goodell: The amendment to the amended complaint which is amending paragraph 8 of the amended complaint filed in this case makes blanket allegations. They don't go into particularity, but they make blanket allegations of disparities that exist between the white and the colored elementary schools. Now one of the disparities covered by that pleading in amendment to paragraph 8 of the original —of the amended complaint, is teaching. Now I take it that under that allegation it would be fair—it would be a fair line of proof for them to admit—to introduce evidence that we are treating the teacher differently with respect to their contracts and their salary and so forth. So of course you don't get as good work and their children are suffering because they are not getting the benefit of a well-paid teacher.

Judge Huxman: Speaking for myself, Mr. Goodell, I am still of the opinion that even if that is so, if that is their position, it's a matter that you can't very well reduce to an absolute agreement. They may not——

Mr. Goodell: I see the Court's point about that.

Judge Huxman: ——they may not contend that. If they do, it's their burden to establish. If they fail to establish it, it's out of the case. If they make the contention it's a very simple matter for you to prove that it isn't so.

[fol. 62] Mr. Goodell: Of course they know that whether it's a fact or not. I say that it's a fact, but I agree with you that they may not care to admit it and perhaps shouldn't be required to.

Judge Huxman: No. 11 is out. All right. No. 12:

"That Exhibit D, attached hereto and made a part hereof, is a correct compilation of statistics of the transportation costs for the colored elementary schools in the City of Topeka for the 1950-1951 school period."

Mr. Goodell: That is shown by our records, the treasurer's office.

Judge Mellott: Do you contend that that is not an accurate compilation, gentlemen?

Mr. Charles Scott: We agree to it.

Mr. John Scott: That is admitted.

Judge Huxman: No. 13:

"That Exhibits E-1 to E-5 inclusive, attached hereto and made a part hereof, are correct compilations of statistics relating to public school nurses in the City of Topeka, Kansas, and correctly set forth statistics relating to public health nurses in the City of Topeka for the 1950-1951 school period."

Mr. Goodell: Now all that exhibit is is to show the num-[fol. 63] ber of persons or children served by the various public school nurses over the city as reflecting on the question of whether there are enough nurses to give adequate service to the colored schools. In other words, it shows the load per pupil for the nurses.

Mr. Carter: Your Honor, there again is one of the things that we don't know. We are not going to controvert it.

Mr. Goodell. Our records show it.

Judge Huxman: If the records show it, could you not agree to the exhibit without agreeing to the matter which they intend to establish by it. You don't have to agree to that. You could agree that this is a fact or the facts shown by this exhibit are correct. You don't have to agree to the conclusion that flows from that.

BLEED THROUGH

Mr. Carter: All right.

Judge Huxman: All right. It is then agreed that Exhibits "E-1" to "E-5", as attached to the request for stipulations, are correct.

Mr. Carter: Yes, sir.

Mr. Goodell: The record is correct.

Judge Huxman: And the facts therein reflected are the facts.

Mr. Carter: All right.

[fol. 64] No, No. 14:

"That Exhibits F-1 to F-22 inclusive, attached hereto and made a part hereof, are correct compilations of the elementary public school program for each of the designated elementary schools in the City of Topeka, Kansas, for the 1950-1951 school period."

Any objections to that?

Mr. Carter: No, sir. We agree to that.

Judge Huxman: You agree.

Mr. Carter: Yes, sir.

Judge Huxman: All right. Request for admission No. 14, as read, is agreed.

Judge Mellott: Let me be on the record for just a moment.

I believe that if I have understood correctly what Judge Huxman has accomplished so far in the pre-trial, it has resulted in the receipt in evidence of all of these exhibits here, is not that correct, gentlemen?

Mr. Charles Scott: That is correct.

Judge Mellott: I am wondering if we shouldn't just turn these exhibits over to the clerk and let him mark them as exhibits admitted in evidence for all purposes, and then they constitute a part of the formal record.

Mr. Brewster: We have additional ones, supplemental requests.

[fol. 65] Judge Huxman: I think that is a good suggestion, Judge Mellott, and the parties have agreed to it.

Mr. Goodell: If Your Honor please, we were going back to the preceding paragraphs which were passed for the moment in the light of this last exhibit.

I am willing to amend paragraph 3 by substituting for "curricula" the words, "course of study."

Judge Huxman: Mr. Goodell, let me ask you, for my information, these exhibits, I forget what the numbers of them are, set out the courses of study.

Mr. Goodell: "F-1."

Judge Huxman: The "F" series of exhibits sets out the actual courses of study that are taught in all of these schools.

Mr. Goodell: That's right.

Judge Huxman: What does your request for admission No. 3 add to what those exhibits actually show?

Mr. Brewster: How would it be if on 14 we just added, "And said program includes all courses of study prescribed by the law of the State of Kansas." Is that what you are getting at?

Mr. Goodell: I wanted to make that plan that we were following the prescribed course of study.

Judge Huxman: You have actually set out the courses of study that you say are taught.

[fol. 66] Mr. Goodell: All it takes to pick it up and make it complete——

Judge Huxman: There is no contention made that they don't conform to the state requirements. If they want to claim it, let them prove it. You say those are the courses of study.

Mr. Goodell: I don't care to belabor the point.

Judge Huxman: What would 3 add?

Mr. Goodell: Three supplements 14 only in respect, that it ties up and shows that it's a legal course of study being followed or taught.

Judge Mellott: May I suggest that the reporter read what Mr. Brewster interpolated and see if, perhaps, his interpolation may not be added as a part of your admission with reference to Exhibit "F".

(Portion referred to by Judge Mellott read aloud by the reporter.)

Judge Mellott: Is there any reason why you couldn't supplement No.——

BLEED THROUGH

Mr. Carter: I think, if I may, Your Honor——

Judge Mellott: Any reason why you couldn't supplement No. XI which you have agreed to, by the addition of what Mr. Brewster just said.

[fol. 67] Mr. Carter: I frankly am unable to see where it adds anything. We have admitted the facts.

Judge Mellott: I don't think it adds much. You are not contending that Topeka in the operation of its school system is refusing to abide by the statutes of Kansas and the orders of the state superintendent of public instruction with reference to courses of study, are you; you are not making that contention.

Mr. Carter: I would prefer, however, Your Honor, if the exhibit which sets out the courses and they are admitted in the record, I think they speak for themselves.

Judge Mellott: You haven't answered my question. I think you should answer it. Do you contend that the board of education of the City of Topeka, Kansas, is not complying with the state law and the regulations and the orders of the state superintendent of public instruction?

Mr. Carter: That is not our contention, no.

Judge Mellott: All right.

Judge Huxman: Then why do you object to this addition? The only reason you could object to it is that you claim they aren't complying.

Mr. Carter: Well, Your Honor, the point is that we have admitted the courses of study. These are facts which [fol. 68] they have set forth in the record; these are the courses of study which are taught.

Judge Mellott: Well, I think we would take his statement as an admission that of course he is not contending that the Board of Education of Topeka is doing other than complying with the Kansas statutes so far as course of study is concerned. I would certainly spell that out of counsel's statement.

Judge Huxman: With that statement by counsel perhaps the addition isn't necessary.

Judge Mellott: I don't think so.

Judge Huxman: Let's take up the supplemental requests for stipulations which have been filed by the defendants.

No. 15:

"That Exhibit G, attached hereto and made a part hereof, is a correct statement taken from the records of the Board of Education of the City of Topeka, Kansas, pertaining to bus schedules for colored elementary school children for transportation furnished said children by the said Board of Education for the 1950-1951 school year."

Is there any objection to agreeing to that stipulation?

Mr. Carter: We agree to that, Your Honor, with the exception of line 9.

[fol. 69] Judge Huxman: Line 9?

Mr. Carter: Line 2 under "Monroe"; that is on the exhibit itself.

Judge Mellott: That is on the exhibit.

Mr. Carter: Line 2 under "Monroe."

Judge Huxman: Which says, "8:10—First and Kansas." You don't agree to that.

Mr. Goodell: You mean that is erroneous? What should it be?

Mr. Charles Scott: Should be First and Quincy.

Mr. Goodell: Is that correct, First and Quincy?

Judge Mellott: Let's change it to First and Quincy, then.

Mr. Goodell: I am writing that in as an amendment then.

Judge Huxman: And, as amended, plaintiffs agree to request 15 for admissions.

Mr. Carter: Your Honor, Mr. Scott brought something to our attention. This addendum down here, "Bus picks up students also anywhere along route."

Judge Mellott: You haven't gotten to that yet, have you?

Mr. Carter: That is on the same exhibit—on the exhibit.

[fol. 70] Judge Huxman: "Bus picks up students also anywhere along route." You don't agree to that?

Mr. Carter: I understand that they picked them up at these various stops.

Mr. Goodell: They do and, in addition, along the way at not designated stops they will pick them up. That is what they tell me; I don't know. That is what the clerk's office tells me has been the practice for years.

Judge Mellott: Well, do you Topeka lawyers especially, do you know whether that is a fact or not?

BLEED THROUGH

Mr. Charles Scott: No, sir.

Judge Mellott: Suppose we admit the exhibit, then, eliminating from it the parenthetical clause and let that remain as an item requiring proof, if that is required.

Judge Huxman: If requested. As so modified, do you agree to the admission?

Mr. Charles Scott: Yes, sir.

Judge Huxman: All right.

No. 16:

"That Exhibit H attached hereto and made a part hereof, is a correct statement of facts from the records of the Board of Education of the City of Topeka pertaining to teacher load in the kindergartens of the Topeka public schools for [fol. 71] the 1950-1951 school year."

Any objection to agreeing to that?

Mr. Carter: Our witness informs us that this is not correct.

Judge Mellott: Who is your witness?

Mr. Carter: Dr. Speer.

Judge Mellott: What does he know about it; has he checked the records?

Mr. Carter: Yes, sir.

Judge Mellott: Is he here now?

Mr. Carter: No, he isn't.

Judge Mellott: How much of that is covered here in exhibits which are already in evidence.

Mr. Carter: I don't know.

Judge Mellott: You have stipulated with refere, I believe it was "E" or "F", has already been covered. Let me refer back here.

Mr. Brewster: Series "B", I imagine.

Judge Mellott: You have shown here what the number of kindergarten children were in each of the schools, and you have shown what the average daily attendance of the kindergarten was. I don't know what is shown by "H".

Mr. Carter: Isn't this the teacher load? These are facts taken from that other report, isn't it, Mr. Goodell?

[fol. 72] Mr. Goodell: Sure. It's a breakdown of each school in the City of Topeka showing the teaching load per teacher. In other words, children each teacher has under her for particular grades starting with kindergarten.

Judge Mellott: What I am asking is simply this: Isn't Exhibit "H" a mere assembling of the data which is already in Exhibit "B"?

Mr. Goodell: It's calculations drawn therefrom from that other data; it's a mathematical, in other words, reduction of what the other exhibits show. I can prove that; I don't care to argue it.

Judge Huxman: Now, gentlemen, the Court is of this view, that this exhibit is just a compilation of the other exhibits already in there.

Mr. Carter: But, Your Honor, Mr. Goodell himself says it's a calculation based upon it which is entirely different.

Judge Huxman: That is what I mean, a compilation made from data already in. It's a simple calculation, and it's either right or it's wrong.

Mr. Goodell: Calculation—it's a reduction of the figures used down to teaching load.

Judge Huxman: The Court is of this view, that we will not ask for an admission at this time, and we will give both parties an opportunity to check this exhibit again, against [fol. 73] the basic data which is contained in these other exhibits, and then, before we start into the trial Monday morning, we will again ask Mr. Goodell whether he is satisfied with the correctness, and we will also ask plaintiff- then if they still contend that this computation is not correct, to have for the benefit of the Court your computation in which you point out the manner and respect in which this is not correct. Now if it is not correct, it shouldn't go in. If it is correct, I know both parties want to agree to it.

Now, that is 16, isn't it?

Mr. Goodell: Yes.

Judge Huxman: That will be passed until Monday morning.

Both parties here have shown a spirit of fairness and cooperation and I see no reason in the world why you shouldn't get together on the question of whether this exhibit is or is not correct.

No. 17:

"That Exhibit I attached hereto and made a part hereof is a correct statement of facts from the records of the Board of Education of the City of Topeka pertaining to teacher load in the first six grades of the elementary schools of the Topeka public school system for the 1950-1951 school year."

[fol. 74] Mr. Carter: We could shorten this, Your Honor, if we might have the same ruling as you made on the last one apply to this one.

Judge Huxman: All right. We pass No. 17 to Monday.

Mr. Brewster: As I understand it, their claim is, using the first series of exhibits, we haven't computed correctly, is that what they mean?

Mr. Goodell: No, they are challenging the reductions we made there.

Judge Huxman: No. 18:

"That Exhibit J attached hereto and made a part hereof is a correct statement of facts from the records of the Board of Education of the City of Topeka pertaining to auditoriums and gymnasiums in the elementary schools of the City of Topeka, Kansas."

Mr. Goodell: I think there is a typographical error in that which I would like to correct.

Judge Huxman: All right. Where is that.

Mr. Goodell: Exhibit "J". On the Monroe School where I have in my exhibit "combination", meaning that they have combination auditorium and gymnasium, that is erroneous, according to my later information, that they do not have a gymnasium, only an auditorium.

Judge Huxman: Only an auditorium.

[fol. 75] Judge Mellott: What do you want to do, strike out the word "combination" and put in the word "yes" under "Auditorium."

Mr. Goodell: That's right and "no" under "Gymnasium."

Judge Huxman: And "no" under "Gymnasium", all right. That correction will be made.

Mr. Carter: Your Honor, we don't feel that we can accept this at this time. We are today, as of today, our experts are now checking these items, and we cannot say whether they are true or not, so we are not willing to accept them as of now.

Judge Huxman: We will pass that as we have some of these others until Monday morning.

Judge Mellott: May I inquire if counsel understand that we are expecting you to tell us Monday morning whether these are correct and, if they are not, you will give us what you say the correct data is.

Mr. Carter: I understand that completely.

Judge Huxman: No. 19:

"That no distinction is shown by the Board of Education of the City of Topeka in school plant facilities and equipment, because of race or color. Instead, the same factors are considered and applied by said Board of Education as to plant facilities and equipment in both white and colored [fol. 76] elementary schools."

Mr. Carter: We can't agree to that.

Judge Huxman: All right, plaintiffs will not be required to agree to No. 19.

No. 20:

"That Exhibit K attached hereto and made a part hereof, is a correct statement of facts from the records of the Board of Education of the City of Topeka pertaining to original cost of school buildings in the City of Topeka, Kansas, and correctly states the following:

"1. Name of building or school.
"2. Year of construction.
"3. Structural cost.
"4. Land cost.
"5. Equipment cost."

Mr. Carter: We agree.

Judge Huxman: 20 is agreed to.

No. 21:

"That Exhibit L attached hereto and made a part hereof, is a correct statement from the records of the Board of Education of the City of Topeka pertaining to the present appraised value of the school buildings and equipment, for both white and colored elementary schools; that said appraised value is the appraised value furnished by the appraisers for the insurance underwriters for the purpose of [fol. 77] fixing values of said buildings and equipment for issuing insurance thereon."

Mr. Carter: We agree to that.

Judge Huxman: No. 21 is agreed to.

Now, that completes the defendants' request for agreement.

Judge Mellott: In the light of what has just been gone through, the Exhibits "G" and "K" and "L" seem now to be ready for admission formally, is not that correct, gentlemen?

Mr. Charles Scott: That is correct.

Judge Mellott: The clerk, then, will mark them as admitted in evidence. The others just covered, namely, the others, "H", "I" and "J" may be handed to the clerk and marked for identification only.

How has the map been marked, if at all.

Mr. Goodell: Exhibit "A", Your Honor.

Judge Mellott: Exhibit "A". It may be marked and admitted in evidence, subject to any corrections that counsel may desire to call to the Court's attention based upon the draftsmanship of the map.

Mr. Goodell: I do think this, Your Honor, I want to recheck it. I think since this map was prepared, the copy prepared which came from the map that the Board of Education clerk's office keeps, that there is a segment of that southwest territory that may have been annexed so it wouldn't be correctly outside of the city now.

[fol. 78] Judge Huxman: Yes.

Judge Mellott: Well, I believe we all know and can take judicial notice of the fact that under the statutes of Kansas pertaining to cities of the first class, schools within and adjoining cities of the first class, that the statutes contemplate, and most of the cities of Kansas do, attach to the cities for school purposes territory which is outside of the city, and that is what you refer to as property attached to the city for school purposes.

Mr. Goodell: Yes.

Judge Mellott: Now since your map indicates that certain of that territory has been attached for school purposes but that there may be some inaccuracies in that, you have not checked to see if subsequently some of the territory has actually been annexed to and brought into the city for all purposes.

Mr. Goodell: I will reconcile that with all the later annexations.

Judge Huxman: Let me ask you this, Mr. Goodell, is it your understanding that this map is accurate and correct as to the close of the school year?

Mr. Goodell: Yes.

Judge Huxman: Then it would seem to me, that is, on the questions which we have, that what has taken place in the last three or four months or as to the annexation of [fol. 79] additional territory, would not be any factor in determining the constitutionality — the questions before us in this case, do you gentlemen agree with that?

Mr. Charles Scott: Yes.

Judge Huxman: And if this map is correct as drawn, any changes since would not need to be shown.

(A brief recess was here had at the conclusion of which the following further proceedings were had:)

Judge Huxman: Let me address this remark to attorneys for plaintiffs: Has your request for admission No. 1 not already been met by defendants' request for admission 1. There is no difference in them, is there?

Mr. John Scott: Except for the latter part, Your Honor, "That Negro children of elementary school age are compelled to attend one of the four Negro schools aforementioned because of their race and color, pursuant to the custom and usage provided in General Statutes 1949, 72-1724."

Judge Huxman: That is a fact, isn't it?

Mr. John Scott: Yes, sir.

Judge Huxman: I am asking Mr. Goodell now. That latter part is a fact now, isn't it?

Mr. Goodell: I think it's embraced in our stipulation.

Judge Huxman: You do not have that—you do not have [fol. 80] in your request the statement, "Negro children of elementary school age are compelled to attend one of the four negro schools because of their race and color pursuant to the custom and usage provided in G. S. 1949, 72-1724." You do not have that in your——

BLEED THROUGH

Mr. Goodell: We don't use the statute; we say they are required to attend instead of compelled.

Judge Huxman: That is a fact that it is because of their——

Mr. Goodell: That's right.

Judge Huxman: All right, then—is it then agreed, gentlemen, that it is a fact and so stipulated for the purpose of this trial that negro children of elementary school age are compelled to attend one of the four negro schools provided for in Topeka because of their race and color pursuant to the custom and usage provided in G. S. 1949, 72-1724.

Mr. Goodell: Well, that is a fact. I don't think the "custom and usage" is provided by the statute. It's simply an authorization, but we won't quibble about that.

Judge Huxman: Suppose we eliminate "custom and usage" as authorized.

Mr. Goodell: That is all right.

Judge Mellott: I understand there isn't any dispute.

[fol. 81] Mr. Goodell: We will admit it.

Judge Mellott: —that they are, you say, required—the word "required" connotes about the same thing as compelled.

Judge Huxman: He objected to the words "custom and usage" provided by the statute. The statute doesn't perhaps provide a custom.

Mr. Goodell: I would say pursuant to the statute.

Judge Huxman: All right. We will put in the word "pursuant", is that agreed to?

Mr. Goodell: Yes.

Judge Huxman: All right.

Now, we will take up No. 2:

"2. That the distance be computed based on city blocks from given points of residence of infant plaintiffs and other Negro children similarly situated, to the designated Negro schools where they must attend as outlined on the official map of the City of Topeka."

Judge Mellott: Since we did not require you to go into that average one, it seems to me that you wouldn't want to insist upon this, would you, Mr. Scott?

Mr. John Scott: Well, if Your Honor please——

Judge Huxman: In other words, do you want to go back [fol. 82] now to the defendants' request No. 8 and add to it what you now have, is that what you want to do?

Mr. John Scott: No, sir. We will withdraw that.

Judge Huxman: You will withdraw request No. 2.

Mr. Carter: No, sir. We are talking about an entirely different point there, Your Honor.

Judge Mellott: I don't understand what you are talking about.

Mr. Carter: I will try to explain it for a moment. When the defendants are talking about averages, insofar as we are concerned, we feel that that is irrelevant because it has nothing to do with the individual disadvantage. When we speak here of a distance which is travelled by individual plaintiffs we are attempting to show an individual disadvantage which these plaintiffs have in making the trip. We are not talking about general averages; we are talking about what affects the individual plaintiff, and I think that is entirely a different point.

Judge Huxman: Mr. Counsel, we didn't permit the defendants to commit you to a yardstick of measuring distances and why should we——

Mr. Carter: We will put on proof to that effect.

[fol. 83] Judge Huxman: Let me just finish my sentence for the record so it doesn't stand up there in the air. Why should we permit you to commit them to a yardstick of measurement?

Request for admission No. 2 is withdrawn.

Request No. 3:

"Infant plaintiffs and other Negro children similarly situated are transported by buses to the Negro schools where they attend and are picked up by said buses at designated points along prescribed routes in accordance with schedules and designated pick-up points outlined by the School Board or its agents. A copy of the schedule of routes is hereto attached marked Exhibit 'A' and made a part hereof."

That schedule has already been agreed to, hasn't it, and request No. 3 will therefore, I presume, be withdrawn.

Judge Mellott: That is Exhibit "G" which has been admitted in evidence with the parenthetical clause, "Bus picks up students also anywhere along the route." eliminated.

BLEED THROUGH

Now you gentlemen did tell us, did you not, that you would make inquiry and find out, if you can, by Monday morning whether the parenthetical clause is or is not applicable, can you not do that?

[fol. 84] Mr. John Scott: Yes, sir.

Judge Huxman: That's right.

Judge Mellott: Then that probably covers everything that you have. Now you have a copy of the schedule of routes.

Mr. John Scott: Yes, sir.

Judge Huxman: Is it any different from Exhibit "G"?

Mr. Charles Scott: No.

Mr. John Scott: No, it's exactly the same.

Judge Mellott: Do you propose to offer it in evidence as an additional exhibit?

Mr. John Scott: No, sir. The one that the defendants offered——

Judge Huxman: The entire request No. 3 is withdrawn in view of the admissions already made.

Mr. John Scott: That's right, sir.

Judge Huxman: Request for admission No. 4:

"That no provision made for shelter or protection against inclement weather conditions or safety regulations at designated pick-up points for infant plaintiffs and other Negro children similarly situated while waiting for the arrival of their respective buses."

[fol. 85] What do the attorneys for the defendant say as to that request?

Mr. Goodell: We don't have shelter-houses, so I would say we do admit that. "Safety regulations" is pretty broad. I don't know what they mean by that.

Judge Huxman: Well, what would you say to this: Safety regulations other than those provided for traffic generally.

Mr. Brewster: The board of education doesn't provide the lights anyway.

Mr. Goodell: In Topeka the Police Department and the traffic control division have jurisdiction over those matters.

Judge Huxman: Don't you gentlemen feel that the question of safety regulations could be deleted? What value is there to——

Mr. John Scott: Well, if Your Honor please——

Judge Huxman: Now you can show, if you want to, that there are no added regulations or precautions. Of course the Court will take knowledge, in the absence of anything else, that the usual conditions with respect to traffic and travel in the city obtains, and no other, unless it's shown.

Mr. John Scott: Yes, I think that is sufficient, don't [fol. 86] you?

Mr. Carter: Yes.

Mr. John Scott: I think that is sufficient.

Judge Huxman: Then is it agreed that request for admission No. 4, as follows, is agreed to:

"That no provision made for shelter or protection against inclement weather"—"That no provision is made for shelter or protection against inclement weather conditions."

Do the defendants agree to that?

Mr. Goodell: That is correct.

Judge Huxman: And we will omit from your request the reference to any additional safety regulations.

Mr. John Scott: Yes, sir.

Judge Huxman: I didn't go quite far enough, Mr. Reporter. The admission should read as follows:

"That no provision is made for shelter or protection against inclement weather conditions at designated pick-up points for infant plaintiffs and other Negro children similarly situated while waiting for the arrival of their respective buses."

That is the admission as it is agreed to.

Judge Mellott: The affirmative answer was made by counsel for the School Board.

Mr. Goodell: Yes.

[fol. 87] Judge Huxman: No. 5:

"That said buses make only two trips a day to and fro to the respective all Negro schools in the morning as prescribed"——

BLEED THROUGH

Judge Mellott: We don't have the exhibit, so I suppose——

Judge Huxman: Would you object if we substituted for your Exhibit "A" the number of their exhibit to which——

Judge Mellott: Exhibit "G".

Mr. John Scott: That will be perfectly all right.

Judge Huxman: "in the morning as prescribed in Defendants' Exhibit 'G' admitted in the record and in the evening at the close of school."

Judge Mellott: I understand that is admitted.

Mr. John Scott: Yes, sir.

Judge Mellott: Correct, Mr. Goodell?

Mr. Goodell: Yes.

Judge Huxman: I wanted to stop there purposely; so far you admit that much of the request of No. 5.

Mr. Goodell: The schedule shows that they are taken to the school in the morning and returned at night.

[fol. 88] Judge Huxman: Now, we will take up the rest of the request because we might run into trouble there. The further request is made for an admission, "As a result, infant plaintiffs and other Negro children similarly situated are required to spend the entire day at their respective school without the opportunity and benefit of seeing their parents during the noon hour and are required to eat cold lunches which are prepared by their parents before leaving home in the morning."

Mr. Goodell: We are not prepared to admit. It's a conclusion.

Judge Huxman: That is a conclusion, isn't it, that flows from the admission.

Mr. John Scott: We can prove that, Your Honor.

Judge Huxman: That portion of the request will be denied.

Mr. Goodell: I don't think it's a proper issue in the case because they are treated no differently than white children. If they want to go home for lunch, they go, and if they don't, they stay and eat lunch.

Judge Huxman: That is argumentative, in any event.

Request No. 6:

"That the respective buses are without any supervisor other than the driver to exercise disciplinary measures [fol. 89] and control of said children."

Is that agreed to?

Mr. Goodell: I don't think we send a guard along; I believe that is accurate; we just have a driver.

Judge Huxman: You agree to that, then.

Mr. Goodell: I would like to check it. I think it's correct.

Judge Huxman: Let's put it this way, you agree to that, subject to your right to check and withdraw your agreement if your further investigation shows otherwise.

Mr. Goodell: Yes.

Judge Huxman: No. 7:

"That Buchanan School does not have an auditorium or gymnasium; such facilities are available at Sumner,"—before we go further, gentlemen, we have already covered the question of auditoriums and gymnasiums in the series of exhibits designated "J".

Mr. John Scott: Yes, sir.

Judge Mellott: We have not yet admitted "J", but you were to——

Mr. John Scott: —check it.

Judge Mellott: —check it and give us any corrections on Monday morning.

Mr. John Scott: That's right.

Judge Huxman: Then we should not agree to request [fol. 90] No. 7 here and that can be ironed out on your investigation as to Exhibit "J", as proffered by the defendant.

Mr. John Scott: Yes. We will withdraw that.

Judge Huxman: Request for admission No. 7 is withdrawn because of these other matters in the record.

No. 8:

"That Monroe School's playground or a portion thereof is separated by a public thoroughfare adjacent to the building and located on the easterly side of said playground is the A. T. S. F. Railroad right-of-way and track."

Is that a fact, Mr. Goodell?

Mr. Goodell: I believe that is accurate, yes.

Judge Huxman: Then you admit request No. 8 as read.

Mr. Goodell: Yes.

Judge Huxman: All right.

BLEED THROUGH

No. 9:

"That no provisions are made for electrically operated school stop signs and safety signals at any of the Negro schools and no safety measures are provided for Infant Plaintiffs and other Negro children similarly situated who are required to cross the intersection of First and Kansas [fol. 91] Avenue at a time when the vehicular traffic is dense, while they are enroute to the designated bus pick-up points and at other busy intersections throughout the City of Topeka where Infant Plaintiffs and other Negro children similarly situated are required to cross enroute to designated bus pick-up points."

Mr. Goodell: We can't admit that because it isn't an accurate statement. Furthermore, we have no control over traffic lights, electric devices. The City of Topeka Police Department takes traffic counts at various points in town and, from their determination, decide that a designated point should have school blinker signs, and we have several cases, the evidence will show if we get in that point,—in several cases requested signs which they on the traffic count didn't think it was justified and wouldn't put them in. We don't have any control over it.

Mr. John Scott: If Your Honor please——

Judge Huxman: Didn't we, when we had up defendants' request for agreement, agree that there were no extra safety or traffic regulations provided at these places.

Mr. Goodell: I don't think so. There are some——

Judge Mellott: Let me ask this question: You agree, do you not, Mr. Scott and counsel for the plaintiffs, that Mr. [fol. 91a] Goodell is correct in his statement that the Board of Education has nothing whatever to do with putting in blinker lights and safety devices for school children and others to cross the public streets, but at best, can only request that the traffic department of the state and the city police department take care of those matters; do you not agree that that is a fact?

Mr. John Scott: We agree that that is a fact and also, to extend that, Your Honor, I think the first part of that request is a fact, that there are no——

Judge Mellott: Well, I suppose that if you divide the request, there may be some merit, "That no provisions are made for electrically operated school stop signs and safety signals at any of the Negro schools." Now, I suppose——

Mr. Goodell: If the Court please, that is not accurate.

Judge Mellott: Then you should not agree upon it.

Mr. John Scott: It is accurate.

Mr. Goodell: No, it isn't accurate.

Mr. John Scott: We can prove it, Your Honor.

Judge Huxman: The Court feels that that is a very minor matter, whatever the electrical arrangements are or aren't, and, if you can't agree on it, it will take only fif-[fol. 92] teen minutes of evidence to establish what the fact is.

Mr. Goodell: They make a broad statement, as I understand it, no safety devices in any of the areas traversed by the colored children to go to their schools——

Judge Huxman: They don't say that at all.

(Colloquy was here had off the record.)

Mr. Goodell: For example, on 10th Street, you have Parkdale School and Washington School in very close proximity. The negro children who have to cross 10th Street to get to Washington School that walk and don't ride, they use that traffic sign—I mean there is a designated crossing for school children where they cross over 10th there for Parkdale. Now it's splitting hairs to say that is solely for Parkdale and no benefit to Washington.

Judge Huxman: Well, the Court feels that is a minor matter.

Mr. Goodell: We have got that situation in other parts of town.

Judge Huxman: It's a simple matter, and we will not require the parties to agree on that—request No. 9.

Mr. John Scott: We can prove it very easily, Your Honor.

[fol. 93] Judge Huxman: I believe the attorneys for the plaintiffs will agree that this case, the outcome, doesn't hinge upon that one little factor; I doubt whether it's going to be determinative too much.

Now, does that conclude plaintiffs' requests for admissions?

BLEED THROUGH

Mr. John Scott: Yes, sir.

Judge Huxman: We want to ask at this point counsel for the State of Kansas whether they have at this time any requests for admissions of fact in addition to what has been agreed to and, if not, whether they go along with, and agree to, these admissions which have been made by the respective parties to this litigation.

Mr. McQueary: If Your Honor please, the position of the State of Kansas, insofar as this lawsuit or this controversy is concerned, is going to be to endeavor to uphold the constitutionality of the statute in question, and our participation will be limited to that field, and so far as equal facilities or the conditions provided by the Board of Education of the City of Topeka or the facilities enjoyed by the negro, by the plaintiffs, we are not going to make that a matter of issue insofar as we are concerned. We have no knowledge as to that; we haven't investigated it. That will be left solely to the other parties in this matter.

Judge Huxman: Then I understand your position is that you have no request for admissions of fact.

[fol. 94] Mr. McQueary: We have none, Your Honor.

Judge Huxman: And that the state has no interest in these admissions which have been made by the parties, the plaintiff and defendant, other than the state, because you do not think that they touch the state's phase of this case.

Mr. McQueary: That is a correct statement.

Judge Huxman: All right.

Mr. Goodell: I have one more matter. I would like to request a stipulation that the—as an exhibit, that seventeen cites, first and second class cities of the State of Kansas, operate separate colored and white schools in the elementary grades, and I have an exhibit.

Judge Huxman: I am not sure that I understand that, Mr. Goodell.

Mr. Goodell: I have an exhibit with the names of the cities showing that seventeen cities in the State of Kansas are operating their elementary school systems similar to Topeka—strike that—operating separate white and colored schools in the elementary grades pursuant to the same statute.

Judge Huxman: Is there any objection to that admission?

Mr. Greenberg: Yes, Your Honor. We object on the [fol. 95] ground that what may happen in any other city in the State of Kansas is not relevant to the rights of our particular plaintiffs who operate in this school system here and now.

Judge Huxman: Since there is one member of the Court not here, in any event we will—and since this is the trial court, we will receive it. You have no objection to the correctness of the statement.

Mr. Greenberg: We don't know, as a matter fact; we haven't——

Judge Huxman: You have no reason to doubt the correctness of the statement.

Mr. Greenberg: We have had no occasion to investigate it because we haven't thought it pertinent.

Judge Huxman: The exhibit will be received subject to its materiality.

Judge Mellott: It will be marked as Exhibit "M", Defendants' Exhibit "M".

Judge Huxman: Also subject to the right of counsel before trial, if he so desires, to attack it as to its correctness.

Mr. Greenberg: That is agreeable.

Judge Huxman: Is there anything else?

Judge Mellott: That may be taken up Monday also.

[fol. 96] Judge Huxman: Is there anything else now, gentlemen?

Judge Mellott has a matter that he would like to inquire about. Go ahead, judge.

Judge Mellott: I was only going to suggest to my associates on the bench that we may not have covered categorically sub-division (6) of Rule 16 which says that it's proper for us at a pre-trial to give consideration to such other matters as may aid in the disposition of the action. That is, of course, only a general statement. Does either side care to suggest, in line with that sub-section, any other matters which you think might be taken up with the Court at this time which would aid in the disposition of the action.

Mr. Goodell: I think of none, Your Honor.

Judge Mellott: Very well. The concluding sentences of the rule under which we are now functioning provides that, "The court shall make an order which recites the action taken at the conference, the amendments allowed to the pleadings, and the agreements made by the parties as to any of the matters considered, and which limits the issues for trial to those not disposed of by admissions or agreements of counsel;''.

Now, where a pre-trial is handled as intelligently and as expeditiously as this has been handled by reason of the [fol. 97] preliminary requests for admissions having been made and secured to some extent, it seems to me that perhaps it is wholly unnecessary for this tribunal to make any order because your record itself shows just what disposition has been made.

Counsel may desire to secure from the reporter copies of what has been accomplished, but I believe that the way in which this has been handled that everybody has it pretty well in mind, and I am suggesting that perhaps it would be mere supererogation and wholly unnecessary for the Court in this particular instance to dictate into the record a lengthy order inasmuch as Judge Huxman has pretty well covered that as we have proceeded.

Do you think this Court should make a separate order or not?

Mr. Goodell: No, I think not.

Judge Huxman: All right. Anything else that anyone has to suggest which might tend to expedite this hearing before we recess. If not, the pre-trial conference will be recessed until 10:00 o'clock Monday morning when we will take up for final disposition the matters that we have left here in abeyance and which you gentlemen on your respective parts will investigate and see if you can satisfy yourselves, and we will then make final disposition of that and immediately go into the trial of this case at the conclusion —final conclusion of the pre-trial conference.

[fol. 105] Transcript of Proceedings—Filed October 16, 1951

[fol. 106] Be it remembered, on this 25th day of June, A.D. 1951, the above matter coming on for hearing before Honorable Walter A. Huxman, Judge, United States Court of Appeals, Tenth Circuit; Honorable Arthur J. Mellott, Judge, United States District Court, District of Kansas, and Honorable Delmas C. Hill, Judge, United States District Court, District of Kansas, duly constituted as a Three-Judge Court under Chap. 155, Title 28, U.S.C., and the parties appearing in person and/or by counsel, as hereinabove set forth, the following proceedings were had:

[fol. 107] Colloquy Between Court and Counsel

Judge Huxman: I take it there are no additional parties to be entered of record. All of that was done the other day, was it? Anyone else to be entered as an attorney of record?

Mr. Goodell: If the Court please, this is Mr. Bannon, attorney for the Board of Education of Leavenworth, Kansas.

Judge Huxman: Do you desire to have your name entered as——

Mr. Bannon: As appearing, Your Honor, but I do not know whether or not the Board might ask for authority to file a brief at some later stage of the proceeding.

Judge Huxman: All right.

Mr. Goodell: The attorney for the Board of Education at Coffeyville.

Judge Mellott: I suppose he should be admitted only as amicus curiae at this time since he filed no pleading.

Mr. Goodell: I suppose so.

Mr. Dallas Knapp, attorney for the Board of Education at Coffeyville called me and asked to have his name entered and wanted to be allowed to participate for filing a brief.

Judge Huxman: Well, we will have his name entered at this time, and we will determine—— [fol. 108] Mr. Goodell: The same is true of Mr. Hal Harlan, of Manhattan, Kansas, who is attorney for the Board of Education there.

Judge Huxman: What do they desire?

Mr. Goodell: To have his name entered and be permitted to file a brief.

Judge Huxman: His name will be entered, and the question of filing of briefs amicus curiae will be determined at the conclusion of the hearing.

Mr. Goodell: Surely.

Judge Huxman: Now, at the conclusion of our pre-trial conference Friday there were certain matters that were passed for final determination this morning. The first one I have noted is Stipulation 16, which reads as follows: "That Exhibit "H", attached hereto and made a part hereof, is a correct statement of facts from the records of the Board of Education of the City of Topeka, pertaining to teacher load in the kindergarten of the Topeka public schools for the 1950 and 1951 school years." Attorneys for plaintiff wanted opportunity to check into that. What do you say this morning?

Mr. Carter: We are willing to accept that.

OFFERS IN EVIDENCE

Judge Mellott: Let the record show Exhibit "H" is formally admitted then in evidence.

Defendants' Exhibit "H", having been offered and [fol. 109] received in evidence, is contained in the case file.

Judge Huxman: All right. Request 17; "That Exhibit 'I', attached hereto and made a part hereof, is a correct statement of facts from the Board of Education of the City of Topeka, pertaining to teacher load in the first six grades of the elementary schools of the Topeka public school system for the school years 1950 and 1951."

BLEED THROUGH

Mr. Carter: We will accept that, too.

Judge Huxman: The record may show that their request No. 17 is agreed to, stipulated, and that Exhibit "I" is admitted.

Defendants' Exhibit "I", having been offered and received in evidence, is contained in the case file.

Judge Huxman: Request No. 18, "That Exhibit 'J', attached hereto and made a part hereof, is a correct statement of facts from the records of the Board of Education of the City of Topeka pertaining to auditoriums and gymnasiums in the elementary schools of the City of Topeka, Kansas."

Mr. Carter: On that we have a question, Your Honor; definition, I suppose. Our investigation reveals——

Judge Huxman: I didn't understand.

Mr. Carter: We have a question. I suppose it's one of definition and—— Judge Huxman: Let's look at Exhibit "J". Is that in [fol. 110] the original exhibits?

Mr. Carter: That is in the supplement attached to the supplement that you were reading; pertains to auditoriums and gymnasiums.

Mr. Goodell: Which one are you talking about now?

Mr. Carter: Exhibit "J".

Mr. Goodell: Any particular part of Exhibit "J"?

Judge Huxman: All right. Now what is it?

Mr. Carter: We are unable to accept the definition under "Buchanan" "Yes", as having an auditorium because our investigation shows that there are two rooms, makeshift rooms, that have been thrown together in which there are chairs. Now we think that is totally different from the feeling of an auditorium which has been built in the school. With that reservation, we will accept that part.

Judge Huxman: If we eliminated "Buchanan" do you accept the statements in Exhibit "J" as to the auditorium and gymnasium in Central Park, Clay—what are the three colored schools?

Mr. Goodell: Monroe.

Judge Huxman: Do you accept the rest of the exhibit with the exception of that pertaining to Buchanan?

Mr. Carter: Well, just three items, Your Honor. If you [fol. 111] read down there to Lafayette——

Judge Huxman: Is that a colored school?

Mr. Carter: No, sir; that is not. It is shown here "yes" an auditorium, "no" gymnasium. We have found that there is a playroom in the school building which is ample, and we think that that should be entered on the record.

Mr. Goodell: We say "yes" it has an auditorium.

Judge Huxman: Suppose we change the "no" to "playroom", what do you say, Mr. Goodell?

Mr. Goodell: I don't think it's accurate; neither is his statement accurate about Buchanan. We will offer evidence on it.

Judge Huxman: All right. If you can't agree, we will eliminate Lafayette from the exhibit.

Mr. Carter: And we have the same——

Judge Huxman: Just a minute. How about Buchanan? You won't agree to Buchanan as stated in the exhibit?

Mr. Carter: No, sir.

Judge Huxman: We will eliminate Buchanan.

Mr. Carter: We agree with everything else on the exhibit with the exception of Polk and Potwin and in both of those schools there are playrooms, even though there is no gymnasiums.

Judge Huxman: Polk and Potwin. All right. We will [fol. 112] eliminate Polk and Potwin. With Buchanan, Lafayette, Polk and Potwin eliminated, do you agree to Exhibit "J" as it now remains?

Mr. Carter: Yes, sir.

Judge Huxman: The record will then shown that it is agreed that Exhibit "J", with Buchanan, Lafayette, Polk and Potwin eliminated therefrom, will be admitted and received in the record as evidence.

Defendants' Exhibit "J", as agreed to above, having been offered and received in evidence, is contained in the case file.

Judge Huxman: Now, that is all that I have marked that was left for consideration today. Have I omitted anything?

BLEED THROUGH

Mr. Carter: No, sir, not that I know of.

Judge Huxman: Any other stipulations that the parties wish or can agree to as to evidence?

Mr. John Scott: If the Court please, we have prepared a map of the City of Topeka for the purpose of showing valuations of the buildings that are located within the City of Topeka school district.

Judge Huxman: That is a- evaluation of the school buildings?

Mr. John Scott: The school buildings; that is correct, sir, and we would like to enter this as a stipulation in this [fol. 113] particular case.

Mr. Goodell: I couldn't agree to that without knowing something about it. Who appraised it?

Mr. John Scott: Dr. Speer.

Mr. Goodell: I wouldn't agree to such a thing as that. It's some school teacher that gave an expert opinion about——

Mr. John Scott: It's no such a thing.

Judge Huxman: Now, gentlemen, don't get to quarreling with each other before the real trial starts.

Mr. John Scott: This was taken from your exhibits.

Judge Huxman: Now, just a minute; you address your remarks to the Court, please. If you can't agree to it, why you can offer it in the due course of time, and we will then rule on it at that time.

Judge Mellott makes this suggestion, and I agree with him: This case to the Court is just another burden that we have in a trial to be decided by us and approached by us just as any other case that comes before the Court. It will be the endeavor of the Court to decide this case according to the law and the evidence. We realize that, of course, there is considerable sentiment in this case that you can't get away from. We trust that, first, there will be no quarreling or bickering among counsel; it's not [fol. 114] called for; it isn't necessary; doesn't add anying to the value of the case. We trust that counsel will keep that in mind. Also, there will be no demonstration on the part of the audience or spectators in any way. This, of course, is a public trial. We want all those who are interested to be here; but the decorum that is maintained in federal courts must be maintained throughout the trial.

Is there anything else before we proceed to the trial of the case? If not, the Court is ready to proceed with the trial of case No. T-316, Orville Brown and others vs. Board of Education of Topeka, Shawnee County, Kansas.

Mr. Carter: If Your Honor please, plaintiffs would like to invoke Rule 43(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and call as the first witness the president of the Board of Education, Mr. Kelsey Petry.

Judge Mellott: That is what, calling your adversary as a hostile witness?

Mr. Carter: Yes, sir.

Judge Mellott: "A party may interrogate any unwilling or hostile witness by leading questions. A party may call an adverse party or an officer, director, or managing agent" and so forth. Proceed.

Judge Huxman: You may proceed.

Judge Mellott: The witness that was called come forward; Mr. Speer, was that his name?

[fol. 115] Mr. Goodell: It is my understanding that this witness was out of the city.

Judge Huxman: Who is the witness?

Mr. Goodell: Mr. Petry, who is president of the board.

Judge Huxman: Is he here? Is Mr. Petry here?

Mr. Goodell: He was out of the city, I think, when the subpoena was issued, in Colorado.

Mr. Carter: Then we will call Mr. Saville.

Judge Huxman: Mr. Saville present? Come forward and be sworn.

ARTHUR H. SAVILLE, having been first duly sworn, assumed the stand and testified as follows:

Direct examination.

By Mr. Carter:

Q. Mr. Saville, how long have you been a member of the Board of Education of Topeka?

A. About twelve years.

BLEED THROUGH

Judge Mellott: May I have the witness' name?
The Witness: Arthur H. Saville.

By Mr. Carter:

Q. What are your duties and responsibilities as a member of the Board of Education?
[fol. 116] A. To adopt policies that are carried out by the school administration, build a budget and various things of that sort.

Q. Does the Board of Education promulgate rules and regulations governing the entire school system of Topeka?
A. Yes, sir.

Q. You maintain, do you not, eighteen schools, elementary schools, in Topeka that are located in eighteen territories, is that correct?
A. Elementary schools? I think there are twenty-two.

Judge Huxman: Isn't that all stipulated to, the number of schools that are maintained.
Mr. Carter: Yes, sir; it's stipulated to, but I am leading up to a question.
Judge Huxman: All right.

By Mr. Carter:

Q. Well, you maintain a total of twenty-two.
A. I believe so, yes, that is correct.

Q. Eighteen are for white children and four for negro children.
A. That's right.

Q. Now, why is it that the Board of Education requires negro children to attend the four separate schools in Topeka?

Mr. Goodell: Object to that as incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial and invading the province of the Court. The pleadings show the issues are joined, that they are doing it, [fol. 117] and they are doing it under a permissive statute, 72-1724. The personal feelings of a board member has nothing to do——
Judge Huxman: I think the objection will be sustained.
Mr. Carter: I think, if I may——

Judge Huxman: It's agreed they are doing it under statute and the ordinance of the City of Topeka.

Mr. Carter: I know that, Your Honor, but I think that I would be entitled to inquire as to whether there are any rules and regulations that the board adopted.

Judge Huxman: You did inquire that and you ask him now why they maintain them. The objection is sustained.

By Mr. Carter:

Q. In your opinion, as a member of the Board of Education, would the board—wouldn't the board have a much simpler problem, since it must maintain the high schools on an unsegregated basis, to integrate negro and white children at the elementary school level?

Mr. Goodell: Object to that as incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, not having any probative force on the issues in this case.

Judge Huxman: The objection will be sustained.

By Mr. Carter:

Q. Mr. Saville, are you familiar with the document known [fol. 118] as the comprehensive plan of the City of Topeka and Shawnee County, Kansas. I might add that this was—this document was sponsored jointly by the Board of City Commissioners, the Board of County Commissioners and the Board of Education of Topeka and, at the time of the sponsorship, your name, A. H. Saville, is listed as being on the board.

A. Yes.

Q. You are familiar with this.

A. Is that the Bartholomew plan?

Q. Yes, sir.

A. I believe I remember it.

Q. Can you tell me whether or not this plan has been adopted, is being followed at the present time by the Board of Education.

Mr. Goodell: Object to that as incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial; has to do with a long-range view building plan; outside the issues of the case.

Judge Huxman: The objection will be overruled. He may answer.

BLEED THROUGH

The Witness: Frankly, I don't remember. What was the date of that?

By Mr. Carter:

Q. The document was published May, 1945.

A. I couldn't tell you; I couldn't answer that yes or no.

Q. You can't say whether before this document was [fol. 119] published you looked at it as a member of the Board of Education and approved it.

A. Yes, I looked at it—I am familiar to some extent with the contents of the document, but I have no recollection at this time what's contained in it.

Q. Well, if I may, I would like to address your attention to several extracts from the document and find whether this is the policy of the board or whether you approved of it. The document reads as follows, under Schools, Chapter 7. "Schools and Recreational Facilities. No city affords satisfactory living facilities unless adequate parks and schools are available to all persons living therein. Just as the economic welfare of the community is largely dependent upon the extent and diversity of its commerce and industry, the mental and physical wellbeing of the population are largely dependent upon the educational and recreational facilities available. The vital role which public education plays in democracy has long been recognized." Would you subscribe to that statement?

Mr. Goodell: We object to that as pursuit here of an academic matter of a report prepared by Bartholomew which this witness didn't prepare.

Judge Huxman: What's the purpose of this line of questioning?

Mr. Carter: This is a document, Your Honor, which was [fol. 120] sponsored by the Board of Education. It is true that it sets up a long-range plan. The document was prepared by Harlan Bartholomew, but it is indicated in the document that changes were made in it, and so forth, at the suggestion of the various people here listed, the members of the Board of Education. I think that I am entitled to attempt to find out whether or not this witness, as a member of the Board of Education, either had anything to do with the preparation of the document, whether he agrees with the statements, some of the statements which are listed here and whether they are being followed. Now, Mr. Saville indicates he does not know whether this plan is now being followed by the Board of Education.

Judge Huxman: Mr. Counsel, the question before the Court in this case is not what the viewpoint of anyone is or might be as to the future, the present or the past; but it seems to me the question in this case turns upon what the City of Topeka has and is doing, and what they may think about it is immaterial, if they are furnishing adequate facilities. If they are doing that, then what they are thinking about is immaterial. The objection to this line of questioning is sustained.

Mr. Carter: Your Honor, I don't want to press this point too much, but I think the Court is being unduly severe. [fol. 121] There are statements in here which have to do with a question of the adequacy of facilities.

Judge Huxman: That is a long-range program laid down by a man, Bartholomew, who is not even a member of the Board of Education. It has nothing to do with what the City of Topeka is doing or is not doing with regard to its school system. No, the objection will be sustained. That line of questioning will not be pursued.

Mr. Carter: All right, Your Honor. I think that is all.

Judge Huxman: Any questions?

Mr. Goodell: No questions.

Judge Huxman: Any need for this witness remaining longer or may he be excused from attendance?

Mr. Carter: We have no further need for him.

Judge Huxman: You are not required to attend further upon the Court.

(Witness excused.)

KENNETH MCFARLAND, having been first duly sworn, assumed the stand and testified as follows:

Direct examination.

By Mr. Carter:

Q. Mr. McFarland, you are at present the superintendent [fol. 122] of schools of Topeka, Kansas?

BLEED THROUGH

A. Correct.

Q. How long have you been superintendent?

A. Nine years.

Q. Are there any rules and regulations that you know of that are in force with regard to the choice of schools by negro pupils in the school system, among the four that are set aside for them?

A. Well, we have administered the schools as they were organized at the time this administration took over in 1942. The four negro districts were established at that time.

Q. What I am driving at is what determines, in terms of the place in the city where a negro child lives, what determines what school that child will attend?

A. Those districts were drawn prior to 1942 and adopted by the Board of Education, and we have administered them in essentially the same form.

Q. Well, may I have what they are?

A. Well, you have a map.

Judge Huxman: Doctor, what he asks is what determines the location, if you know. Is that what you want?

Mr. Carter: I am trying to ask—there are four negro schools—the white schools—the school system is divided into territories. That apparently is not true of the negro [fol. 123] schools. Now a negro who lives—out let's say—let's say the Randolph area, what determines what school, what colored school, he or she will attend? That is what I am trying to find out. Are there any rules about that? ered by the admitted state of facts.

Mr. Goodell: Object to this as already having been covered by the admitted state of facts.

Judge Huxman: I am sorry; repeat that question.

(The last preceding question was here read by the reporter.)

Mr. Goodell: The objection is that this is in conflict with the admitted statement of facts.

Judge Mellott: Was it admitted? I have overlooked it, and that is what I was asking Judge Huxman, is the reason he didn't hear you. In paragraph 2, I believe, of your original stipulation——

Mr. Goodell: On Page 2, Your Honor, there was that—that portion was not agreed to.

Judge Mellott: That is what I thought.

Mr. Goodell: I withdraw my objection.

Mr. Carter: That is what I am trying to find out.

Mr. Goodell: Our pleadings allege that a colored child may attend any one of the four colored schools based upon [fol. 124] the selection of his parents.

Judge Mellott: As I recollect it, counsel did not agree upon that Friday, so I think he should pursue it.

Judge Huxman: The witness may answer.

The Witness: Theoretically, the plan would be to give the best coverage possible with four buildings in relationship to where children live and with relationship to bus routes, and so forth.

By Mr. Carter:

Q. Now, Mr. McFarland, the defendants have introduced a series of exhibits relating to school program, teacher salaries, bus schedules and transportation costs. Are you familiar with those exhibits?

A. Not in detail. I am familiar with the fact that the exhibits were prepared and delivered to the counsel.

Q. They were prepared in your office.

A. By my office, yes.

Mr. Carter: If I may get the exhibit "F"(1) to "F"(22).

Mr. Goodell: You have copies of that.

Mr. Carter: All right.

By Mr. Carter:

Q. I want to direct your attention—these are the exhibits. Now, those exhibits "F"(1) to (22) relate to the school schedule program for the school year in each of the schools. [fol. 125] Judge Mellott: You said "F"(22).

Mr. Carter: "F"(1) to (22) covering the twenty-two schools.

By Mr. Carter:

Q. That is the school program for each of the schools. What I want to know, we do not have any information as to the hours that school is in session. Would you have that at your fingertips?

A. Well, 9:00 o'clock until 4:00 o'clock is the general hour for elementary schools.

Q. Is there any difference with respect to—does that apply from the first grade through the sixth grade?

A. No, first grades convene a little later, adjourn a little earlier, so do kindergartens. They also have different schedules for the first few weeks of school than they do later.

Q. Without regard for the first few weeks of school, I would like to get the accurate figures on that, if available. When does kindergarten convene and when does it let out?

A. Well, we have let the kindergartens out at 11:30.

Q. They convene at 9:00?

A. And convene at 9:00.

Q. Do you have any in the afternoons?

A. 1:30 and 3:30.

Q. 1:30 and 3:30.

A. I think most of those—— [fol. 126] Q. What about the first year, the first grade?

A. We usually, during warm weather, when the schools first start, we are more lenient on those; we will start about fifteen minutes later.

Q. That would be 9:15.

A. 9:15. We will let them out at 11:30 and sometimes 11:45.

Q. 11:30, 11:45. They reconvene at what time?

A. 1:30, 1:15.

Q. Until 4:00. What about the second through sixth?

A. 1:15 to 4:00.

Q. What about the morning schedule?

A. 9:00 to 12:00.

Q. 9:00 to 12:00. An hour for lunch.

A. Right; an hour or a half or an hour and fifteen minutes, depending.

Q. In order that I may be absolutely correct on this, you have half session of kindergarten, half day of kindergarten from 9:00 to 11:30 or from 1:30 to 3:30.

Judge Huxman: Answer, doctor.

The Witness: Yes.

By Mr. Carter:

Q. You have in the first grade, you convene at approximately 9:00 or 9:15; you let out at approximately 11:30, 11:45.

A. Right.

Q. And reconvene at 1:15 to 4:00.

[fol. 127] A. That's right; those are approximately right. There are some variations in that. We have a schedule here, if you want it, admitted in evidence.

Q. If you have the schedule.

A. We have a complete schedule of that and will be glad to get it.

Q. Well, I think it would be—if it's here I would like to see it because I am going to ask some questions.

Mr. Goodell: If the Court please, we introduced, and it's admitted, the program. I don't understand—do you claim they don't get as many hours of instruction?

Mr. Carter: What I am trying to find out is the hours of the classes. You have introduced the program but not the hours of the school.

Mr. Goodell: If the Court please, we submit it would be immaterial unless he claims there is disparity between the two schools as to hours of instruction.

Judge Huxman: I don't see much probative value to that unless there is discrimination, if you will not pursue it too far——

Mr. Carter: I am going to ask some questions on it, Your Honor, and I think the questions will be germane. I wanted [fol. 128] to be certain that Mr. McFarland is certain of his hours. I don't want to have an approximation, and I am not trying to lead you or trap you. I merely want to get the facts. I think it's important for us to know the school schedule.

The Witness: We should prepare a schedule and hand it to you for every school, in that case.

By Mr. Carter:

Q. You mean there are differences?

A. And differences in season, difference in time.

BLEED THROUGH

Judge Huxman: Does counsel contend there is a discrimination in those hours between colored schools and white schools?

Mr. Carter: We are trying to find out something which we think is—affects the school program with regard to a particular school in terms of—that would—it would be important for us to know what hours the classes are in session, and it is for that reason I am particularly anxious to find that out.

Judge Huxman: Do you contend there is any discrimination between the hours in the colored schools and in the white schools?

Mr. Carter: That is not what we are directing it to, Your Honor. We would contend there is discrimination if certain facts occur with regard to the hours that the school operates. For example, I would be interested chiefly in [fol. 129] Washington School. I am chiefly interested in what the schedule is in Washington School, particularly the first grade, kindergarten and the second to sixth grade.

Judge Huxman: Mr. Counsel, the Court feels that this is purely a fishing expedition at this time. You don't make an allegation that there is discrimination in the hours of school in colored schools as against the white schools. You are just, by your frank admission, you are stating that you are trying to see whether there is or not. The Court is going to sustain this objection; going to sustain an objection to this line of questioning at this time. You have an opportunity at recess to get this schedule and go over it. If you can find anything material in it, why you may then pursue this line of examination and Dr. McFarland will be available. But just to go into a fishing expedition in all of this line of testimony, the Court doesn't think it's proper. The objection will be sustained at this time.

Doctor, you will make available to counsel those schedules for their examination, if you have them.

The Witness: We have them.

Judge Huxman: Then if you want to renew your request for this examination later on, you may pursue it, but at this time the objection is sustained.

[fol. 130] Mr. Carter: The thing I want to find out, I think I can find out.

By Mr. Carter:

Q. Now, I would like to direct your attention to Exhibit "G", which is the morning schedule, bus schedule, to take the negro children to school, is that correct?

A. Yes.

Judge Mellott: What is your——

Mr. Carter: Exhibit "G".

Judge Mellott: Exhibit "G".

By Mr. Carter:

Q. I understand that from—from Mr. Goodell that there was not submitted a schedule for taking the children home, but he has advised me that that would be available. Now, I would also like to address your attention to Exhibit "D" and then we can take "D" and "G" together.

Mr. Goodell: Exhibit what?

Mr. Carter: "D".

Judge Huxman: "D" like in dog.

Mr. Carter: "D" like in dog.

By Mr. Carter:

Q. Now, I am directing your attention to both of those schedules, both of those exhibits. I note that you—the Board of Education paid a Miss Washington for transportation of negro pupils in 1950-1951. Can you tell me what part of the schedule on Exhibit "G" Miss Washington [fol. 131] handled?

Judge Huxman: What is the materiality of that?

Mr. Carter: I want to find out, Your Honor—I want to find out the bus schedule for each—who is handling each of the bus schedules because we think it's material.

Mr. Goodell: We object to this as being outside——

Judge Huxman: Will you state in what respect it's material.

Mr. Carter: Well, for example, I want to find out whether Mr. Grimes handles both the schedule which is listed at the top to Washington and the one listed at Monroe; whether Mr. Grimes handles the 8:00 o'clock pick-up to

BLEED THROUGH

8:29 and then—I think I want to find out how that operates. I want to find out what bus—which of these people handles the taking of the children to McKinley and which handles the taking of the children to Buchanan.

Mr. Goodell: I object to this as incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, and outside the scope of the issues made up by the pleadings and the admitted stipulation of facts. The two exhibits that he's asked to compare with, one of them is [fol. 132] a regularly maintained bus; the other he has called attention to are some teachers, an isolated case of a teacher or two in the kindergarten who has taken her private car and taken children home, which ordinarily would be done by taxi cabs or by the bus, but to let the teacher make a little extra money, at their request voluntarily, she has taken them home and has been paid by the Board of Education.

Judge Huxman: Mr. Counsel, the Court fails to see any materiality in the question as to who drove the bus. The Court can't see how it makes any difference.

Mr. Carter: Let me pursue it for a moment; I won't take up your time, Your Honor.

By Mr. Carter:

Q. The bus schedule, as listed here, indicates that with regard to Monroe School, children are taken to Monroe; they begin at 8:00 o'clock; they are let off at Monroe School at 8:29. Now, it's my understanding—I would like to have it cleared up—that this same bus driver and this same bus then has a pick-up at 6th and Brannan at 8:30. Now I—the only way I can find that out——

Judge Huxman: Ask the witness if he knows whether that is a fact or not.

Mr. Carter: That is what I asked, Your Honor, whether Mr. Grimes handled both of these schedules. Mr. Grimes is the one who is involved in this.

[fol. 133] Mr. Goodell: Do I understand it that you challenge the accurateness of that exhibit now? You want to inquire into its accuracy, is that what you are getting at?

Mr. Carter: I would like to find out whether Mr. Grimes handles both of these and, therefore, I have a right to, of course, inquire into that.

Mr. Goodell: If the Court please, we renew our objection. They have admitted the bus schedule as being accurate excepting only that they stop at additional places other than the scheduled bus stops.

Judge Huxman: The doctor may answer, if he knows. I fail to see the materiality of it.

The Witness: I don't know.

Mr. Carter: All right, that's okay.

By Mr. Carter:

Q. Now, Mr. McFarland, in your schools are there anything that you call special rooms that you have set aside for white children in your public school system?

A. Yes.

Q. Are there any such special rooms for negro children in the public schools?

A. We have no special rooms for negro children. We have health rooms for both, but not special rooms.

Q. What is the nature of these special rooms?

A. Special rooms are for groups that are, for one reason [fol. 134] or another, unable to fit into regular classroom, do regular work and still we would consider as public school people.

Q. If you know, can you tell us why there are no special rooms for negro children?

A. We haven't had the need. We haven't had, we felt, sufficient numbers of them who were far enough out of line from the regular group to warrant special rooms.

Q. Are any provisions made in the school system for hot lunches, aside from the health rooms? I understand the health rooms are for undernourished children.

A. That's right.

Q. Aside from that, are any provisions made for hot lunches?

A. Not in elementary schools.

Q. I see. Now that would apply to the negro children regardless of the fact that whether they were too far to go home to lunch, you make no provisions for hot lunches for them, is that right?

A. Outside the health rooms, no provision. You understand we have two health rooms for four colored schools, where we have only two health rooms for eighteen white schools.

BLEED THROUGH

Q. I understand. Can you tell me, in terms of the transportation of pupils to school, if you know, can you tell me what is the number of children that are transported, negro children that are transported to school, total number.

[fol. 135] A. I couldn't give you that figure. I don't have it at hand.

Q. Is that figure available?

A. We can get that for you.

Q. Would I be able to get that from you?

A. Yes.

Mr. Carter: That's all.

Judge Huxman: Any questions by defendants?

Mr. Goodell: We have no questions.

Judge Huxman: Anyone request the presence of Dr. McFarland any further, or may he be excused?

Mr. Carter: Well, I would like for Dr. McFarland to be able to get from him the school schedule and the number of pupils transported, and I think——

Dr. McFarland: You mean class schedule or hours? You want hours?

Mr. Carter: Hours that the school is in session, that is, including the afternoon recess.

Judge Huxman: Can you furnish that, doctor?

Dr. McFarland: Yes.

Judge Huxman: Will you furnish that to counsel on each side and also copies for the Court?

Dr. McFarland: Yes, sir.

[fol. 136] Lena Mae Carper, having been first duly sworn, assumed the stand and testified as follows:

Direct examination.

By Mr. John Scott:

Q. State your name to the Court please.

A. Lena Mae Carper.

Q. Are you one of the plaintiffs in this action?

A. Yes.
Q. Where do you live, Mrs. Carper?
A. 1217 Hillsdale.
Q. 1217.
A. Yes.

Mr. Goodell: Twelve what?
The Witness: 1217 Hillsdale.

By Mr. John Scott:

Q. Is that in the City of Topeka?
A. Yes.
Q. Are you married, Mrs. Carper?
A. Yes.
Q. And do you have children or a child of school age?
A. I have one.
Q. What is her name?
A. Katherine Louise Carper.
Q. How old is she?
A. She's ten years old.
[fol. 137] Q. Will you state to the Court what school she attends?
A. She attends the Buchanan School.
Q. The Buchanan School. What grade is she in?
A. Fifth grade.
Q. Fifth grade.

Mr. John Scott: For the purpose of the record, the residence the plaintiff, Mrs. Carper, has testified to appears to be in the district Gage and Randolph indicated on the official map of Topeka, the same being Exhibit—Defendants' Exhibit "A".

Mr. Goodell: No, that is our exhibit "A". Oh, pardon me. Did you say was in both of those school districts?

Mr. John Scott: Yes, and it's also indicated on the map in the color of red and blue.

Mr. Goodell: Do you mean it's in Gage and Randolph?

Mr. John Scott: Gage-Randolph.

Mr. Goodell: There are two different territories.

Mr. John Scott: She lives in the same district.

By Mr. John Scott:

Q. Now, Mrs. Carper, how does your child go to school?

BLEED THROUGH

A. She has to walk about four blocks on Huntoon and then [fol. 138] has to cross the highway at Huntoon and Gage and catch a school bus.

Q. What time does she catch the school bus?

A. The school bus is supposed to be there at 8:40. However, I go to work, and I go with her each morning she goes to school, and sometimes it has been as high as five minutes to nine before the bus showed up.

Q. Can you state to the Court the approximate distance from the school—strike that—the approximate distance of the pick-up point to the Buchanan School.

A. Oh, in the neighborhood of about—oh, I say about twenty-four blocks, anyhow.

Q. And can you state to the Court what schools that you live near?

A. She—we live near the Gage Park or the Randolph School.

Q. Randolph School. And is there also a school now under construction located at 17th and Stone?

A. Yes.

Q. Do you know the name of that school now under construction?

A. No, I don't.

Q. Are you also located near that particular site?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, Mrs. Carper, do you prepare a lunch for your child?

A. Yes.

[fol. 139] Q. Every day that she attends school?

A. Yes.

Q. Does she come home for dinner?

A. No.

Q. What time does she return home?

A. She usually gets home around 4:30.

Q. Around 4:30. Have you ever had an occasion to observe the number of people riding the bus that your child rides?

A. When the bus comes for my child it's nearly loaded.

Q. When you say "nearly loaded" be more explicit about that, Mrs. Carper.

A. Sometimes it is really overloaded.

Mr. Goodell: Move to strike that answer as a conclusion of the witness.

Judge Huxman: Overruled.

By Mr. John Scott:

Q. And I believe you stated, Mrs. Carper, that there have been times that the bus has been late, is that correct?

A. Many times.

Q. Would that be during the cold winter months?

A. Yes.

Q. And what would your child and other children be doing at that time?

A. They would usually stand in the cold waiting for the bus until they couldn't stand it any longer, and then we would take them to a small grocery store on Gage and [fol. 140] take them in there and try to get them warm until the bus come. When the bus come, I would get out and hail the bus in front of the store to pick them up.

Q. Are there any shelters or any means of protection against weather conditions there on the corner where the bus stops?

A. None.

Q. Is there a stop signal there at Huntoon and Gage?

A. Absolutely none.

Q. Can you tell the Court what the traffic conditions are where your little girl catches the bus?

Mr. Goodell: Object to this as outside the scope of the issues and the pleadings. There is no evidence that the Board of Education has any control over safety devices, the installation or operation of them.

Mr. John Scott: If the Court please——

Judge Huxman: Just a minute. The objection will be overruled.

By Mr. John Scott:

Q. Did you understand the question?

(The last preceding question was here read by the reporter.)

A. At that time of the morning the cars are really congested going along that highway. It's really congested traffic along there at that time. In the morning most people are going to work at that time.

BLEED THROUGH

[fol. 141] Mr. John Scott: I believe that is all. You may cross examine.

Mr. Goodell: No questions.

Judge Huxman: You may step down; call your next witness.

(Witness excused.)

KATHERINE CARPER, having been first duly sworn, assumed the stand and testified as follows:

Direct examination.

By Mr. John Scott:

Q. Katherine, don't be nervous; these gentlemen up here are your friends. Now, what is your name?

A. Katherine Carper.

A. 1217 Hillsdale.

Q. What—was that your mother that was just on the stand?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know the difference between right and wrong, [fol. 142] Katherine?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you know what it means to tell the truth, don't you?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now, Katherine, you attend Buchanan School, is that correct?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you also ride the bus.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. I want you to tell these three gentlemen up here—strike that. Just tell the Court how many people, the conditions of the bus that you ride when you catch it in the morning,

A. It is loaded, and there is no place hardly to sit.

Q. There is no place hardly to sit, is that right?

A. No, sir.

Q. People are standing up.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you have stood on the corner when it was cold, is that right?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And did your hands get cold?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now what grade are you in, Katherine?

A. Fifth.

[fol. 143] Q. Fifth grade.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know what time you arrive at school in the morning?

A. Quarter to nine.

Q. And what time does school—what time does school start?

A. Nine o'clock.

Q. What grade does she teach?

A. The first and half the second.

Q. Is that at Buchanan School?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And does she do anything else other than teach school?

A. Takes the kindergarten home.

Q. The kindergarten children home.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What time does she take the kindergarten children home?

BLEED THROUGH

A. Eleven thirty.

Q. Eleven thirty. And what does she do with her class?

[fol. 144] A. Let's them go into Miss McBrier's room.

Q. Mrs. McBrier?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What grade does she teach?

A. The third and half the second.

Q. The third and half the second. Is her class out at the time that Mrs. Crawford's children go in there?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. They are out. Katherine, I want you to tell these three gentlemen what the conditions of the bus in the evening are when you go home.

A. Sometimes when I get on the bus it is loaded, and there is no place to sit.

Q. And are the children sitting on top of each other?

A. Yes, sir.

Mr. Goodell: We object to this whole line of leading questions of counsel testifying rather than the child.

Judge Huxman: They are slightly leading, but try not to lead the witness. The objection is overruled.

By Mr. John Scott:

Q. In your neighborhood, Katherine, do you live in a neighborhood with white children?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you play with them?

[fol. 145] A. Yes, sir.

Q. What schools do they go to?

A. Randolph.

Mr. Goodell: I object to that as incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, outside the issue.

Judge Huxman: Objection to this line of questioning will be sustained.

Mr. John Scott: I believe that is all.

Judge Huxman: Any questions? You may be excused.

(Witness excused.)

Mr. Goodell: If the Court please, if they will tell me where these children live, what the distance is to the pick-up point, we will agree to all of this and shorten this up.

Judge Huxman: They are entitled to make their case. We will proceed this way, at least presently.

OLIVER L. BROWN, having been first duly sworn, assumed the stand and testified as follows:

Direct examination.

By Mr. Bledsoe:

Q. You may state your name to the Court, please.
A. Oliver Leon Brown.
Q. And where do you live, Mr. Brown?
[fol. 146] A. 511 West First Street.
Q. Are you a citizen of the United States?
A. I am.
Q. And you are a plaintiff in this lawsuit?
A. I am.

Judge Huxman: Talk a little louder, Mr. Brown.
Judge Mellott: He didn't answer yet.
The Witness: Yes.

By Mr. Bledsoe:

Q. What is your business or occupation?
A. Carman welder.

Mr. Bledsoe: Speak a little louder.
The Witness: A carman welder.
Judge Huxman: Mr. Brown, it's difficult to hear you. I wish you would make an effort to speak so we can hear you distinctly; we want to hear what you say.

By Mr. Bledsoe:

Q. Are you married?
A. Yes.
Q. And, if so, who constitutes the members of your family
A. I do.
Q. What I mean by that, who constitute the members of your family?
A. I have a wife and three children.

BLEED THROUGH

Q. What are the ages of your children?

[fol. 147] A. My oldest daughter is eight years old; I have one four and another one five months.

Q. What is the name of your daughter, oldest daughter?

A. Linda Carol Brown.

Q. In what school district or territory do you live, Mr. Brown?

A. I live in the Sumner District.

Q. Sumner School District.

A. Yes.

Mr. Bledsoe: For the purpose of the record, if the Court please, let it be shown that the witness resides in Sumner School District. I think it's this district here marked (indicating on exhibit)—that is colored red.

Judge Mellott: Well, I am afraid your testimony standing alone isn't too intelligent; it isn't to me. Now, as I understand it, Topeko is one school district, you agreed at the pre-trial, but you said that there were certain territories.

Mr. Bledsoe: Well, I may susbstitute territory for—if I may—territory for district.

Judge Huxman: Wouldn't it be more helpful to the Court if you just had these witnesses locate their residence with reference to the colored school that they attend, rather than having it defined by the various territories. [fol. 148] That is the important factor, how far they are from school.

By Mr. Bledsoe:

Q. Now, Mr. Brown, where do you live with reference to Monroe School?

A. Well, — stated that I live at 511 West First Street which is fifteen blocks, approximately, from Monroe School.

Mr. Goodell: I didn't get that.

Judge Mellott: Fifteen blocks from Monroe School.

The Witness: Twenty-one blocks, pardon me; approximately twenty-one blocks.

By Mr. Bledsoe:

Q. You are talking about now the way your daughter has to travel to go to Monroe School, is that correct?

A. That is true.

Q. Does your daughter ride the school bus?

A. Yes.

Q. All right. Now, Mr. Brown, what time does your daughter leave home in the morning to walk to First and Quincy, the bus pick-up point, to go to school; what time does she leave home?

A. She leaves at twenty minutes 'till eight o'clock.

Q. Twenty minutes of eight.

A. Every school morning.

Q. What time, or thereabouts, does she board the bus [fol. 149] at First and Quincy?

A. Well, she is supposed to be there at eight o'clock and which she has been, in many instances, but many times she has had to wait through the cold, the rain and the snow until the bus got there, not knowing definitely what time it gets there all the time.

Q. All right. Now, Mr. Brown, she boards that bus about eight o'clock. What time does she arrive at the school?

A. She's supposed to arrive at the school around 8:30.

Q. Eight thirty. And, as I understand it, what time does the classes begin at school?

A. Nine o'clock.

Q. What does your daughter do between the time the bus arrives at the school at 8:30 and 9:00 o'clock?

A. Well, there is sometimes she has had to wait outside the school until someone came to let them in, through the winter season and likewise, many times.

Q. What else does she do, if anything?

A. Well, there is nothing she can do except stand out and clap her hands to keep them warm or jump up and down. They have no provisions at all to shelter them.

Q. And what you want the Court to understand is that your daughter is conveyed to the school, she gets there by 8:30 in the morning, and that she has nothing to do until school starts at 9:00 o'clock, is that right?

[fol. 150] A. That is correct.

Q. Now, Mr. Brown, you don't—withdraw that, please. What provisions are made by the school board for your daughter to have warm lunch, if any.

A. There are no provisions made at all.

BLEED THROUGH

Judge Huxman: Mr. Bledsoe, hasn't it been agreed and testified to by Dr. McFarland that no provision is made for warm lunches?

Mr. Bledsoe: I beg your pardon; I believe you are correct, if the Court please.

Judge Huxman: That stands admitted, doesn't it?

Mr. Bledsoe: That's right; that is all right. Let me withdraw that, please.

By Mr. Bledsoe:

Q. Now, then, your child—you don't get to see your child during the daytime until she returns home in the evening, is that right?

A. That is correct, sir.

Q. Would you, Mr. Brown, would you like to have your daughter home, have the same opportunity of giving her parental guidance as the white fathers and mothers might do their child.

A. Yes, sir.

Mr. Goodell: We object to the form of that question as assuming a state of facts not in evidence and, in fact, con[fol. 151] trary to some of the admitted stipulation of facts.

Judge Huxman: The objection will be sustained.

By Mr. Bledsoe:

Q. But you do not see your daughter from the time she leaves in the morning until she returns in the evening, is that correct?

A. I do not.

Q. What time is that?

A. She gets home around fifteen minutes to five.

Q. Fifteen minutes to five. Do you know whether or not there is any provisions made to shelter or protect your daughter while she is standing on the street or the designated bus pick-up——

Judge Huxman: Mr. Bledsoe, that has been testified to, and I think it's conceded no shelter is provided in any of these points where colored children are picked up, is that not so, Mr. Goodell?

Mr. Goodell: That's right.

By Mr. Bledsoe:

Q. Now, Mr. Brown, what is the condition of the area there between your residence and First and Quincy where your daughter boards the bus?

A. Well, there are a considerable amount of railroad tracks there; they do a vast amount of switching from the Rock Island yards and from the time that she leaves [fol. 152] home until she gets to Quincy, First and Quincy, to board the bus, she has to pass all of these switch tracks and she—also including the main thoroughfare, Kansas Avenue and First; there is a vast amount of traffic there morning and evening when she goes and returns. There is no provisions at all made for safety precautions to protect those children passing these thoroughfares at all.

Q. Now, Mr. Brown, if your daughter were permitted to attend Sumner School would there be any such obstructions or any such conditions as she will meet on her way to First and Quincy?

A. Not hardly as I know of.

Q. How far is it from your residence to Sumner School?

A. Seven blocks.

Q. Seven blocks. Mr. Brown, are you assessed a tax for the support and maintenance of the public schools of the City of Topeka?

A. I am.

Mr. Goodell: We object to that, if the Court please; it's wholly outside the scope——

Judge Huxman: He may answer.

The Witness: I am, sir.

By Mr. Bledsoe:

Q. Mr. Brown, do you consider it an advantage to have a school in the neighborhood in which you live near your home? Do you consider that an advantage?

[fol. 153] Mr. Goodell: We object to that as incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial what he considers.

Judge Huxman: Objection sustained.

Mr. Bledsoe: If the Court please, I believe that is really a part of our case.

BLEED THROUGH

Mr. Goodell: If the Court please, every parent would like to have a school next door, but that is impossible.

Judge Huxman: I think it flows naturally it's an advantage to live closer to a school than to have one far away. I don't think we need to spend much time to establish that fact. I think the Court will take judicial knowledge of the fact that if it had children of school age it would rather have them go to a close school than one far away.

By Mr. Bledsoe:

Q. Mr. Brown, is there a more direct route from your residence, 511 West First Street, to the bus pick-up point at First and Quincy; is there any more direct route than there?

A. Than just my family do you mean?

Q. No, for your daughter going down to the bus pick-up point, is there a more direct route for her to travel?

A. No, there isn't.

Q. There is not.

Judge Huxman: Any questions?

[fol. 154] Cross-examination.

By Mr. Goodell:

Q. Mr. Brown, you see that map there, Defendants' Exhibit "A"?

A. I do.

Q. You understand that the portions colored there form the school territory for the whole city of Topeka.

A. I do.

Q. And, directing your attention to the corner here or all the area in blue, you understand that that is territory outside of the city limits of Topeka, but in Topeka for school purposes alone.

A. I understand.

Q. What?

A. I understand that.

Q. You say your child goes four blocks to the bus pick-up point.

A. She goes six blocks to the pick-up point.

Q. Six blocks, pardon me. Don't you know as a matter of fact that in many, many instances there are children that go to the white schools in this town that go thirty and thirty-five blocks and walk to get there.

Mr. Carter: I object to that.

The Witness: Where at?

Mr. Carter: I see no materiality to this question.

[fol. 155] Judge Huxman: Objection will be sustained. That is not proper cross-examination of this witness.

Mr. Goodell: No further questions.

Judge Huxman: The Court will take a short recess of approximately ten minutes.

(The Court then, at 11:15 o'clock a.m., stood at recess until 11:25 o'clock a.m., at which time the following further proceedings were had:)

Judge Huxman: You may proceed:

Darlene Watson, having been first duly sworn, assumed the stand and testified as follows:

Direct examination.

By Mr. Bledsoe:

Q. State your name to the Court, please.

A. Darlene Watson.

Q. Where do you live?

A. I live at 508 West First.

Q. Do you have children of school age?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. And what school do your children attend?

A. They go to Sumner.

Q. Sumner School. Are you acquainted with Oliver Brown and his family, the Oliver Brown who just left the stand.

A. Yes; we are neighbors.

[fol. 156] Q. You are neighbors. Now, Mrs. Watson, are you able to tell the Court what time Linda Brown leaves in the morning to go to school?

BLEED THROUGH

Mr. Goodell: We object to this as repetition; simply cumulative; already been testified to.

Judge Huxman: Yes, this evidence is cumulative but plaintiff is entitled to reasonable latitude.

Mr. Goodell: We will admit the time you say is right; we will admit that.

Judge Huxman: You may answer.

The Witness: I have watched her leave at 7:40.

By Mr. Bledsoe:

Q. Now, do you have a son who attends Sumner School?

A. Yes.

Q. What time does you son leave; you live directly across the street from Mr. Brown.

A. That's right.

Q. Now, what time does your son leave to go to Sumner School?

Mr. Goodell: We object to this as incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, and not tending to prove any burden within the scope of the 14th Amendment which is what this lawsuit involves, for the reason that if this is a proper inquiry, then we have got to subpoena all of the parents of the white children and show in some cases they live [fol. 157] thirty-six blocks away, and they have to leave maybe at 7:15. It's pure accident where families may live close to schoolhouses. We can't have schoolhouses next door to everybody.

Judge Huxman: The objection will be overruled.

The Witness: My boy leaves at 8:40, twenty minutes of nine.

Q. Twenty minutes of nine.

A. Yes.

Q. How far is it from your home to the Sumner School?

A. It's seven blocks.

Q. Seven blocks. And you just testified that Linda leaves home at 7:40 in the morning.

A. That's right.

Mr. Goodell: We object to this as repetition.

Mr. Bledsoe: That is all.

Judge Huxman: Mr. Bledsoe, speaking for myself alone, for your future guidance, I will take judicial knowledge of the fact that where there are only four colored schools in a town of this size, against eighteen white schools, that there are innumerable instances of this kind where colored children will go by a white school and go much farther to [fol. 158] a colored school than they would be required to go if they had the privilege of attending the white school. That is what you are trying to establish, isn't it?

Mr. Bledsoe: That is, if the Court please.

Judge Huxman: I think we can take judicial knowledge of the fact that that is inevitable where you have only four colored schools as against eighteen white schools.

Mr. Bledsoe: That is. You may take the witness.

Mr. Goodell: No questions.

Alma Jean Galloway, having been first duly sworn, assumed the stand and testified as follows:

Direct examination.

By Mr. John Scott:

Q. State your name to the Court, please.

A. Alma Jean Galloway.

Q. Mrs. Galloway, please speak right out enough so the Court and the reporter may hear you, please. Where do you live, Mrs. Galloway?

A. 428 North Lake.

Q. 428 North Lake.

A. Yes.

Q. Do you have a child or children of school age?

[fol. 159] A. Yes; I have two.

Q. Have two. How old are they?

A. One is six and one is five.

Q. And do they attend any of the public schools in the City of Topeka?

A. Washington School.

Q. Washington School. Do you know the approximate distance Washington School is from your residence?

A. I think it's sixteen blocks.

Q. How do they go to school?

A. Well, they take the school bus.

BLEED THROUGH

Q. Where does the school bus pick them up?
A. On the corner of Chandler and Greeley.
Q. How far is the bus pick-up point from your residence?
A. Well, it's two and a half blocks.
Q. Two and a half blocks. Are you located near any school that might be within close proximity of your home?
A. Yes, State Street School.
Q. State Street School. Have you ever had an opportunity to observe the conditions of the buses that take your children to school?
A. Well, no, I haven't.
Q. Are you required to fix a lunch in the morning?
A. Yes.
Q. And your children do not come home at noon, is that [fol. 160] correct?
A. No.
Q. What time do they arrive home in the evening?
A. Well, about five or ten minutes past four.
Q. I see. And what time do they leave in the morning?
A. About between 8:20 and 8:25.

Mr. John Scott: That will be all. You may cross-examine.
Judge Huxman: Any cross-examination?
Mr. Goodell: No.
Judge Huxman: You may step down.

(Witness excused.)

Sadie Emanuel, having been first duly sworn, assumed the stand and testified as follows:

Direct examination.

By Mr. John Scott:
Q. State your name to the Court, please.
A. Mrs. Sadie Emanuel.
Q. Are you one of the plaintiffs in this actions, Mrs. Emanuel?
A. I am.
Q. Where do you live?
A. I live at 1606 East Third.
Q. 1606 East Third Street.

[fol. 161] A. Yes.

Q. Are you a parent of children of school age?

A. I have one boy in school.

Q. How old is he?

A. He is nine years old.

Q. And what school does he attend?

A. He attends Washington School.

Q. Washington School.

A. Yes.

Q. Do you know the approximate distance Washington is from your home?

A. Well, I don't know just exactly, but I imagine it would be from our place to Washington around about fifteen or sixteen blocks, I just imagine; I don't know.

Q. How does your child travel to school?

A. I send him to school on the city bus.

Q. State to the Court why you send your child to school on the city bus.

A. Well, when he was in kindergarten, the kindergarten teacher she picked him up at our home, and then he would return on the school bus in the evenings, and I would meet the school bus which he had about five blocks to come from the bus line when he was in kindergarten, and the reason why that I stopped him—after he got out of kindergarten and started in the first grade when I would [fol. 162] meet the school bus the children would be hanging out of the bus and when they would get so far the other larger children would push the smaller children on the ground, and I bought him a cap and when he came home he said some of the children pulled his cap off and threw it out of the bus, so we were only just one block from the city bus, and he has been riding on the city bus ever since, and I just didn't like it because it seemed that there wasn't any order on the school bus, and I just didn't like the condition; it was so crowded and congested until I just didn't like the idea so I send him to school on the city bus.

Q. And you pay his fare each and every day.

A. I sure do.

Q. Approximately how long have you been doing that, Mrs. Emanuel?

A. Ever since he has been in the first grade.

Q. What grade is he in now?

BLEED THROUGH

A. He is going into the fourth.

Q. Do you prepare a lunch for him in the morning?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. Therefore he stays at school and eats his lunch, is that right?

A. Yes.

Judge Huxman: Mr. Counsel, can't we stipulate and [fol. 163] agree that in all instances lunches are prepared, and the colored students stay from the time they come there in the morning until they go home at night.

Mr. Goodell: That would be true as to the children transported, but it is not an accurate statement as to——

Judge Huxman: That is what I mean, as to those who are transported. Can we stipulate that into the record that all colored school children who are transported stay at the school from the morning; they take their lunch with them and leave the school building only when school is completed in the afternoon.

Mr. John Scott: Yes, sir.

Mr. Goodell: The stipulation ought to be that they are not required to stay.

Judge Huxman: They are not required but, of necessity, they do that.

Mr. John Scott: Convenience.

Judge Huxman: They have no place else to go.

Mr. Goodell: Which is precisely like it is in the white schools where children live far away.

Judge Huxman: We will not add that on to it.

Mr. John Scott: That is your case.

[fol. 164] Judge Huxman: Nothing gained by asking each witness whether they prepare the lunch and whether their children stay there and don't come home until evening because that seems to be the pattern.

By Mr. John Scott:

Q. Is there a school located near your home?

A. Two blocks.

Q. Two blocks. What's the name of that school?

A. Lafayette School.

Q. Lafayette School.

Mr. John Scott: I believe that is all.

Judge Huxman: Any questions; cross-examination?
Mr. Goodell: No.

Shirley Mae Hodison, having been first duly sworn, assumed the stand and testified as follows:

Direct Examination.

By Mr. John Scott:

Q. State your name to the Court, please.
A. Shirley Mae Hodison.
Q. Are you one of the plaintiffs in this action?
A. Yes.
Q. Where do you live?
A. 734 Garfield.
[fol. 165] Q. Do you have a child or children of school age?
A. I have one of school age.
Q. What is his name?
A. Charles Hodison, Jr.
Q. How old is he?
A. He is nine.
Q. Do you know what grade he is in?
A. He is in the fifth.
Q. What school does he attend.
A. Buchanan.

Judge Mellott: What school?
The Witness: Buchanan.

By Mr. John Scott:

Q. Does he ride the school bus?
A. Yes, he does.
Q. What time does he—do you prepare him to catch the school bus in the morning?
A. Well, I have him to leave about ten after eight.

Mr. Goodell: If the Court please, we don't want to be obstreperous. We object to this whole line of questioning on the basis that it could not furnish the basis of recovery, distance travelled, and a long line of decisions by the federal courts have held that that is not such a situation that would invoke the 14th Amendment. I have a long line of decisions on that.

Mr. John Scott: We have——

[fol. 166] Mr. Goodell: That is, those are disparities that are bound up here in any school system, and it occurs within the white districts and that that is not a ground for invoking the equal protection of the laws.

Judge Huxman: The objection will be overruled and, if a study of the authorities should convince the Court that this testimony is incompetent, of course, it would be disregarded in reaching our conclusion. We can't stop to analyze all the cases at this stage.

By Mr. John Scott:

Q. What time did you say he left for school?

A. Ten after eight.

Q. Is that the time the bus arrives?

A. It's supposed to be there about a quarter after.

Q. And where do you catch the bus?

A. On 7th and Garfield.

Q. On 7th and Garfield. That is a block from your home.

A. Just about; I live the second house from the corner of 8th and Garfield.

Q. Do you know the approximate distance Buchanan School is from your home?

A. I am not sure; I believe it's about eight blocks, I imagine.

Q. Would you say twelve?

A. I am not sure.

Q. Do you know what time your child arrives at school?

[fol. 167] A. No, I don't.

Q. Is there a school located near your home?

A. Yes.

Q. What's the name of that school?

A. Clay.

Q. Clay School.

Mr. John Scott: It has already been stipulated about the lunches so we don't have to go into that.

Judge Huxman: Any questions?

Mr. Goodell: No questions.

JAMES V. RICHARDSON, having been first duly sworn, assumed the stand and testified as follows:

Direct examination.

By Mr. Bledsoe:

Q. State your name to the Court, please.
A. James V. Richardson.
Q. Where do you live, Mr. Richardson?
A. 1035 Jewell.
Q. 1035 Jewell. Do you have a—children of school age?
A. One boy.
Q. What is his name?
A. Ronald.
Q. Did you tell me how old he was?
A. Seven years old.
[fol. 168] Q. Seven years old. What school does he now attend?
A. Holy Name School.
Q. The Holy Name. That is a parochial school?
A. That's right, sir.
Q. Why do you send your child to a parochial school, Mr. ——
A. Simply because I do not believe in segregation.

Mr. Goodell: Move to strike out that testimony as incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial.
Judge Huxman: The objection will be overruled.

By Mr. Bledsoe:

Q. Now, did your child ever attend Buchanan School?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. How far is Buchanan School from you?
A. Oh, approximately ten or eleven blocks.
Q. How far is Lowman School from——
A. Two or three blocks.
Q. Two or three blocks.

Mr. Bledsoe: I believe that's all.
Judge Huxman: Any questions?
Mr. Goodell: No questions. You may step down.

(Witness excused.)

BLEED THROUGH

[fol. 169] LUCINDA TODD, having been first duly sworn, assumed the stand and testified as follows:

Direct examination.

By Mr. Bledsoe:

Q. State your name to the Court, please.
A. Lucinda Todd.
Q. Where do you live, Mrs. Todd?
A. At 1007 Jewell.
Q. Do you have a daughter of school age?
A. Yes, I do.
Q. Now what school does your daughter attend?
A. Buchanan.
Q. Buchanan School. How far is Buchanan School from your residence?
A. About ten blocks.
Q. About ten blocks. Is there a school nearer your home than——
A. Yes, there is.
Q. What school is that?
A. Lowman Hill.
Q. How far is that school from your residence?
A. About three blocks.
Q. Does your child ride the bus?
A. Yes, she does.
Q. What time does she leave in the morning?
[fol. 170] A. About twenty minutes of nine.
Q. About twenty minutes of nine. And of course she doesn't return for the noontime.
A. No.
Q. She does not. What time does your daughter get home in the evening?
A. About four fifteen, four twenty.
Q. And she rides—comes home on the bus, does she?
A. Yes, she does.
Q. Have you noticed the condition of that bus as to how many rides it?
A. Yes, I have; it's very crowded.
Q. Mrs. Todd, do you know of any instances where your daughter suffered from waiting for the school bus?

A. Oh, many instances; she has been stranded on the corner waiting for the bus from a half-hour to forty-five minutes many times.

Mr. Bledsoe: I believe that is all.
Judge Huxman: Any questions?
Mr. Goodell: No questions.
Judge Huxman: You may step down, please.
(Witness excused.)

[fol. 171] MARGUERITE EMMERSON, having been first duly sworn, assumed the stand and testified as follows:

[fol. 172] Q. Where do they catch the bus?
A. On 11th and Woodward.
Q. Has there ever been any instances that your children have missed the bus?
A. Yes, there has been.

BLEED THROUGH

Q. You can state to the Court what you did, if anything.
A. Well, they have missed the bus, and I have called the school, and they have sent the bus back after them.
Q. They sent the bus back after them.
A. Yes.
Q. Have there been any instances that they missed the bus and your child didn't go to school at all?
A. No, because when he has missed the bus before that I have sent him on the city bus.
Q. On the city bus, I see. Is there a school located near your residence?
A. Yes, there is.
Q. What's the name of that school?
A. Lowman Hill.
Q. How far is it from your residence?
A. About five blocks.
Q. About five blocks.

Mr. John Scott: That is all. You may cross examine.
Mr. Goodell: No questions.

[fol. 173] Judge Huxman: Step down, please.

(Witness excused.)

Zelma Henderson, having been first duly sworn, assumed the stand and testified as follows:

Direct examination.

By Mr. Bledsoe:

Q. State your name to the Court, please.
A. Zelma Henderson.
Q. Where do you live, Mrs. Henderson?
A. 1307 North Jefferson.
Q. Now, Mrs. Henderson, do you have children of school age?
A. Yes, I do; I have two.
Q. What school does your children attend?
A. McKinley.
Q. How old are your children?

A. Seven and five.

Q. Seven and five. Do you have a child in the kindergarten now?

A. Yes, she just completed the kindergarten.

Q. In what grade—the other?

A. In the first grade.

Q. Is there a school nearer your residence than McKinley School?

A. Yes, there is.

[fol. 174] Q. How far is that school from——

A. I would say approximately five blocks.

Q. What is the name of that school?

A. Quincy.

Q. What time does your children leave home in the morning?

A. All the way from 8:15 to 8:30.

Q. Do they ride the bus?

A. Yes, they do.

Q. And, of course, they don't come back for lunch.

A. No; the little girl did at noon, of course, but the little boy stayed all day.

Q. What time would they return home in the evening?

A. About 4:15.

Q. Now, tell the Court whether or not you prepare lunches for your son.

A. Yes, I prepare lunch but——

Mr. Goodell: Object to this as having already been stipulated to.

Mr. Bledsoe: If the Court please, I have something else I want to——

Judge Huxman: All right, you may ask.

By Mr. Bledsoe:

Q. Do you prepare lunch for your son?

A. Yes, I do.

Q. Tell the Court whether or not your son is able to eat his lunches.

[fol. 175] A. My son——

Mr. Goodell: We object to that; that might depend on a lot of things rather than that the school board——

Judge Huxman: I think the objection will be sustained.

BLEED THROUGH

By Mr. Bledsoe:

Q. Have you noticed any physical difference in your son due to his eating the lunch?

A. Yes.

Mr. Goodell: Wait a minute. We object to this as this witness is not qualified to give an opinion of that character.

Judge Huxman: Objection sustained.

By Mr. Bledsoe:

Q. Have you observed your son; what was his condition?

A. One month after starting to first grade he was ill.

Mr. Goodell: Just a minute, we object to that unless—we are not trying the physical elements of these children unless it's connected up with discrimination and violation of the 14th Amendment.

Judge Huxman: I think the answer would be immaterial. Furthermore, the question is so vague; you couldn't tell what condition was referred to. What effect the eating of a lunch would have upon one individual wouldn't throw any light on the constitutional question involved. The objection [fol. 176] is sustained.

Mr. Bledsoe: That will be all. Thank you.

Mr. Goodell: No questions.

(Witness excused.)

Silas Hardrick Fleming, having been first duly sworn, assumed the stand and testified as follows:

Direct examination.

By Mr. John Scott:

Q. State your name to the Court, please.

A. Silas Hardrick Fleming.

Q. Where do you live, Mr. Fleming?

A. 522 Liberty.

Q. Are you a parent of a child or children of school age?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What are there—how many?

A. Two.

Q. What are their names?
A. Silas Hardrick Fleming, Jr., and Duane Dean Fleming.
Q. And state to the Court their ages?
A. Well, ten and seven.

Mr. Goodell: What was that again, please?
The Witness: Ten and seven.

By Mr. John Scott:

Q. What school do they attend?
A. Washington School.
[fol. 177] Q. Do you know the approximate distance Washington is from your school—I mean from your home.
A. Oh, between ten, twelve blocks, I would say; I don't know the exact distance.
Q. How do they get to school?
A. They ride the East Tenth Street bus.
Q. They don't ride the school bus.
A. No.
Q. You state to the Court why they don't ride the school bus.
A. Well, the school bus is about six or eight blocks away. It comes across Brannan Street; that is about six or seven blocks away from Sixth and Liberty.
Q. You mean that is the pick-up point?
A. That's right.
Q. I see. Go ahead. Well, how far do you have—the children have to walk to catch the regular city bus?
A. Half a block going to school and about a block starting home.
Q. Do you pay their fare?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Each and every day?
A. That's right.
Q. Is there a school located near your home?
A. Yes, there is one two blocks away from me, and there [fol. 178] is one about four or five blocks. They pass two schools going to their school.
Q. They pass two schools.
A. Two white schools, yes.
Q. What's the name of those schools, if you know?
A. Lafayette is one and Parkdale the other.

BLEED THROUGH

Q. Which of the two schools is closer to your home?

A. How's that?

Q. Which of the two schools that you just mention are closer to your home?

A. I guess it's Parkdale; it's two blocks away, Parkdale.

Q. You are mistaken——

A. It's Lafayette.

Q. That's right. Is there any other reason you don't permit your children to ride the school bus?

A. How's that?

Q. Is there any other reason that you don't permit your children to ride the regular school bus?

A. No; my only reason is that it's just about as far away from the bus as they would be from the school. They are only a few blocks away from the school to pick up the bus. I will ask the Court, Your Honor——

Judge Mellott: I can't hear the witness.

The Witness: I would ask this for a few minutes to explain why I got into the suit whole soul and body.

[fol. 179] Mr. Goodell: We object to the voluntary statement.

Judge Huxman: I can't hear what you say.

Mr. Goodell: He wants to explain why he got in with the other plaintiffs to bring this lawsuit.

Mr. John Scott: He has a right to do that.

Judge Huxman: Didn't you consent to be a plaintiff in this case?

The Witness: That's right.

Judge Huxman: You did not?

Judge Mellott: He said he did, but he wants to tell the reason why.

The Witness: I want to tell the cause.

Judge Huxman: You want to tell the Court why you joined this lawsuit?

The Witness: That's right.

Judge Huxman: All right, go ahead and tell it.

The Witness: Well, it wasn't for the sake of hot dogs; it wasn't to cast any insinuations that our teachers are not capable of teaching our children because they are supreme, extremely intelligent and are capable of teaching my kids or white or black kids. But my point was that not only I and my children are craving light, the entire colored race is [fol. 180] craving light, and the only way to reach the light is to start our children together in their infancy and they come up together.

Judge Huxman: All right, now you have answered and given us your reason.

The Witness: That was my reason.

Mr. John Scott: Thank you.

By Mr. John Scott:

Q. Just one more question, Mr. Fleming. What time do your children leave in the morning to go to school?

A. About 8:20.

Q. What time do they get home in the evening?

A. Oh, about 4:10 or 4:15; sometimes the bus is a little early and sometimes late.

Judge Huxman: The Court is going to adjourn presently at 12:00 o'clock. Before we adjourn, we would like to request that counsel on both sides meet with the Court in the district courtroom chambers.

We will adjourn to 1:30. We would like to have counsel meet us at 1:15 in the district courtroom chambers.

You may announce a recess of the court until 1:30.

(The court then, at 12:00 o'clock noon, stood at recess until 1:30 o'clock p.m., at which time court was reconvened [fol. 181] and the following further proceedings were had:)

Judge Huxman: You may proceed.

Mr. Goodell: If the Court please, we do have one of the records that was asked for on the schedule, the hourly schedule, of the elementary schools. I have that record.

Judge Huxman: Is that what they promised to furnish?

Mr. Goodell: Yes.

Judge Huxman: I don't think we have that in the record here. One of those should be marked.

Mr. Goodell: Dr. McFarland said he would furnish it. It was what the witness, McFarland, Dr. McFarland said he would furnish.

Judge Huxman: And that has been prepared.

Mr. Goodell: This is it.

Judge Huxman: Is this offered as an exhibit in the case?

BLEED THROUGH

Mr. Goodell: Yes.

Judge Mellott: What is the next exhibit number, Mr. Clerk?

The Clerk: "N".

Judge Mellott: "N". Let it be admitted as Defendants' Exhibit "N".

[fol. 182] Defendants' Exhibit "N", having been offered and received in evidence, is contained in the case file.

Hugh W. Speer, having been first duly sworn, assumed the stand and testified as follows:

Direct examination.

By Mr. Greenberg:

Q. Will you please tell the Court your name.

A. Hugh W. Speer.

Q. And what is your occupation?

A. I am chairman of the Department of Education at the University of Kansas City.

Q. Have you ever been in public school work, Mr. Speer?

A. Yes, I was in public school work in Kansas for about twelve years.

Q. You mentioned the Department of Education, University of Kansas City, what is the function of the Department of Education?

A. Our chief function at the present time is the training of elementary school teachers.

Q. Do you train teachers eligible to teach in Kansas?

A. Yes, and a number of them do.

Q. How many members are on the teaching staff of your Education Department under your supervision?

[fol. 183] A. At the present about twenty.

Q. Do you have any other responsibilities at your university?

A. Well, I am a member of the President's Advisory Committee; I am chairman of the Curriculum Committee of the university.

Q. Do you regularly come into contact with elementary schools?

A. Yes, we conduct an elementary school of our own. We call it the demonstration school in the summer. We do practice teaching in the public schools in our locality, which means we are in and out of the schools constantly.

Q. Would you tell us something of your educational background, Dr. Speer; where did you attend public school?

A. Attended public schools at Olathe, Kansas.

Q. And what universities did you attend and what degrees do you hold?

A. I hold a Bachelor's Degree from American University in Washington, D. C., a Master's Degree from George Washington University, and a PhD. Degree from the University of Chicago.

Q. What was your major field in your doctorate?

A. Evaluation.

Q. Would you please explain to the Court what evaluation means.

A. Evaluation is a rather general term. We sometimes evaluate educational programs or buildings or the behavior changes that are produced in children as a result of educa-[fol. 184] tional programs.

Q. Do you belong to any professional organizations, Dr. Speer?

A. I am a key member of the National Education Association, a member of the Missouri State Teachers Association, a member of the National Vocational Guidance Association; that is about it.

Q. Do you hold any honors or scholarships?

A. I have recently been granted a Fullbright scholarship by the United States Department of State to lecture on education in Iran.

Q. What will be the purpose of your visit in Iran?

A. I will work through the University of Tehran to help improve the school system of Iran.

Q. Dr. Speer, have you ever made an examination of the elementary schools of Topeka?

A. Yes.

Q. When?

A. During the last month.

Q. Why did you make this examination, Dr. Speer?

A. At the request of counsel for plaintiffs.

BLEED THROUGH

Q. What aspects of the schools did you examine during your examination?

A. We examined the more important aspects that we thought had a bearing on the major issues in this case. We [fol. 185] have examined the buildings, the curriculum, the equipment, the library, the preparation and experience of the teaching staff and the salaries, the class loads, the size of classes and a few other minor points.

Q. Now, I am going to ask you some questions about your findings. What did you find concerning the comparison of teachers in the colored schools with those of the white schools?

A. I found only minor differences between the two groups, and these differences tend to balance each other. For example, in preparation, all the colored teachers have Bachelor's degree and all but 15% of the white teachers have Bachelor's degrees. On the other hand, in terms of Master's degrees, 12% of the colored teachers have Master's degree and 15% of the white teachers hold Master's degrees. The colored teachers average twenty years of experience, and the white teachers nineteen years.

Q. Dr. Speer, what did you find concerning class size and teaching load; would you explain to the Court what teaching load is?

A. Teaching load is the number of pupils which the teacher has each day and, again, here I found not much difference. There is some difference at the kindergar*d*en level where the colored kindergartens are somewhat smaller. I think the white average is 42; the colored aver- [fol. 186] age about 25. But, in grades 1 to 6, the average is very close together; 34 in the white schools and 32 in the colored schools. Again, I would say, I found no significant difference in teacher load or teacher preparation.

Q. In examining the two sets of schools, negro and white, did you find any provisions for special rooms in any of these?

A. I found provision for two special rooms for white children; I found no provision for special rooms for any colored children.

Q. Now, did you study all of the school buildings in Topeka, Dr. Speer?

A. Yes, we examined data in the Board of Education files on all school buildings, and we personally visited, Dr. Buchanan and I and some of my other assistants, we visited about two-thirds of the schools in the city.

Judge Hill: If counsel will let me interrupt, what do you mean by special rooms?

Mr. Greenberg: Well, if I may explain, in the white schools there are rooms for specially retarded or handicapped children, whereas in the negro schools there are none.

Judge Hill: Very well.

By Mr. Greenberg:

Q. Did you examine these schools with regard to their age and their insured value?

A. Yes. We——

[fol. 187] Judge Huxman: With regard to what?

Mr. Greenberg: Regard to their age and insured value.

The Witness: On the revised list furnished by the Board of Education we secured the ages of the buildings and also from the insured values of buildings, as provided by the Board of Education, in the exhibits, we made a study of the current values in terms of the insured values.

By Mr. Greenberg:

Q. Why did you use insurance value rather than construction cost, Dr. Speer?

A. Construction cost back over the sixty-year period dates these buildings would vary a great deal which is obvious. Therefore, we could not make comparisons on construction cost; but we assumed that the Board of Education and their insurance companies have arrived accurately at the current value of buildings, and that those values are reflected in the insurance figures furnished by the board.

Q. Is the total insurance value—does the total insurance value of the building reflect accurately the value of the building as broken down into instructional units?

Mr. Goodell: We object to this testimony from this witness. There is no foundation laid for his expert knowledge about evaluating of physical property. The testimony

BLEED THROUGH

[fol. 188] shows he is an educator, that is true. That is in the field of engineering and architects.

Judge Huxman: The question presupposes a knowledge he might not have because sometimes you only insure a building for three-fourths of its value and others may be insured for 100%.

Mr. Goodell: Plus the additional reason for the objection is that it stands admitted the physical value of the physical plants on two exhibits.

Judge Huxman: We will let the witness answer.

Mr. Greenberg: May I ask him whether or not, as an educational expert he has been trained in evaluating the physical plants of buildings?

Judge Huxman: On the basis of insurance?

Mr. Greenberg: On the basis of insurance.

Judge Huxman: Mr. Counsel, here's the difficulty with that question: Suppose it is the policy of the board to insure Buildings for 25% of their—75%——

Mr. Greenberg: I intend to bring out an explanation of that particular factor.

Judge Huxman: You don't know the basic of the insurance.

Mr. Greenberg: They insure on the basis of 80%, Your Honor, and I intend to bring that out.

[fol. 189] Judge Hill: That would be hearsay from this witness, wouldn't it?

Mr. Greenberg: It has been admitted in evidence by stipulation.

Judge Hill: All right.

Judge Huxman: They are insured at 80% of their value, is that in the stipulation?

Mr. Greenberg: Your printed sheet of insurance values of each building; the one you have right there.

Mr. Goodell: No, that doesn't mean that. We have got an insurance clause that 80% on total loss is paid; that is the type of insurance, but that doesn't mean that their insurability of the buildings is limited to 80%.

Judge Huxman: I think the objection to the question will be sustained.

By Mr. Greenberg:

Q. Dr. Speer, in making your evaluation, did you take into account the fact that some buildings might have had some unused classrooms?

A. Yes.

Q. What significance did you ascribe to that fact?

A. Well, an unused classroom is very limited value to the school. We assume that as most schools operate one class with one teacher, can profitably use one classroom.

[fol. 190] Q. Now, did you conduct a visual inspection of any of the buildings in Topeka as well as inspecting the records which you have indicated?

A. Yes, we did.

Q. How many schools did you inspect visually?

A. We inspected I think it was fourteen directly.

Q. And what criteria did you use to determine which schools you would evaluate merely on the basis of the records and which schools you would evaluate by a personal visit?

A. We first examined the records on all of them, and then, in order to substantiate our findings, we thought we should visit at least a representative sample and we visited in all two-thirds of them, making sure we got the older buildings and the newer buildings and some of the medium-aged buildings so that we would have a representation of the complete range.

Q. What criteria did you use in your visit?

A. We used the usual criteria that are recognized in this area, such as sight, the nature of the structure, the plan of the building, the classrooms, the service rooms, the kindergartens, library books, the supplies, the safety features, the maintenance features. I might add these are the kind of features that are included by such authorities as Holly and Arnold in their scorecard for elementary school [fol. 191] buildings. Dr. Holly is from the Ohio State University and Dr. Arnold is from the University of Pennsylvania.

Mr. Goodell: We object to this as hearsay, about what some book says about evaluation.

Judge Huxman: He is testifying as to the basis of his knowledge of works on this. I think it's competent. This is an expert witness. He may testify.

BLEED THROUGH

Judge Mellott: There seems to be no unanswered question.

By Mr. Greenberg:

Q. In order to save the time of the Court, Dr. Speer, did you make any general observations that seemed to apply to all of the buildings you visited?

A. Yes, I think I can. First of all, in regard to gymnasiums and auditoriums, the facilities, all in all, seemed to be about equal between the colored schools and the white schools. Three-fourths of the colored schools have a combined gymnasium-auditorium, and we would say approximately that proportion of the white schools have similar facilities. However, I should add that none of the colored schools have anything like the luxurious facilities that we would find in the Oakland building or the State Street building or the Gage Building, for example.

Q. How do the various——

A. I might, if I may——

Q. Go ahead.

[fol. 192] A. —add one or two other general observations to save time. The buildings are all well kept, well preserved, and I think well maintained. Dr. Buchanan and I felt that that was equal throughout the system.

Q. How do the buildings compare as to their ages, Dr. Speer?

A. The ages of the white buildings average twenty-seven years, according to the figures furnished by the board, and the ages of the colored buildings thirty-three years. In other words, the white buildings average six years newer. However, I think we should add another feature here. Inasmuch as the newer buildings tend to be larger, we found this to be the case, that according to last year's enrollment figures, 45% of the white children attend schools that were newer than the newest colored buildings, whereas 14% of the white children attended schools that were older than the oldest colored building. To state another kind of a comparison, 66%, or two-thirds, of all white children attend schools that are newer than the average age of the colored buildings.

Q. Dr. Speer, how do the colored schools compare to the white schools in regard to the insured value per available classroom?

A. The average for the white schools is $10,517, and the average for the colored schools is $6,317. Or, stated another way, the insured value per available classroom is 66% [fol. 193] higher in the white schools.

Q. Dr. Speer, did you examine the curriculum in the schools in the City of Topeka?

A. Yes.

Q. Tell the Court what you mean by "curriculum", also.

A. By "curriculum" we mean something more than the course of study. As commonly defined and accepted now, "curriculum" means the total school experience of the child. Now, when it comes to the mere prescription of the course of study, we found no significant difference. But, when it comes to the total school experience of the child, there are some differences. In other words, we consider that education is more than just remembering something. It is concerned with a child's total development, his personality, his personal and social adjustment. Therefore it becomes the obligation of the school to provide the kind of an environment in which the child can learn knowledge and skills such as the three "R's" and also social skills and social attitudes and appreciations and interests, and these considerations are all now part of the curriculum.

Q. I see, Dr. Speer. Do you have anything further to say?

A. Yes. And we might add the more heterogeneous the group in which the children participate, the better than can function in our multi-cultural and multi-group society. For example, if the colored children are denied the experience [fol. 194] in school of associating with white children, who represent 90% of our national society in which these colored children must live, then the colored child's curriculum is being greatly curtailed. The Topeka curriculum or any school curriculum cannot be equal under segregation.

Q. Dr. Speer, I would like to go through these—through the school system rather rapidly now school by school and have you point out key characteristics you found as to each school.

What did you find concerning the Buchanan School in regard to these?

A. The Buchanan School is thirty years old; the insurance value per available classroom is $5,623. It has five rooms, all of which are in use, including a double room divided with sliding doors that is used for an auditorium and also for a playroom. The furniture is quite old, reflecting the age of the building. The site and playground is only fairly adequate. The books in the building are generally old and in poor condition. Many titles date back to the 1920's and even some before 1920.

BLEED THROUGH

Q. What did you find concerning Gage School, Dr. Speer?

A. The Gage School, a white school, is twenty-three years old and has an insured value per classroom of a little more —of $9,136. It has fifteen classrooms all in use. The building is more crowded than most, although the classes run [fol. 195] about average for the system. It has a good auditorium with—it's combination—it has a kitchenette that adjoins the auditorium and has an attractive kindergarten room with murals, toilet facilities and a fireplace; and also it has some old titles among the books, but a fair proportion of the books in this building are of a newer and better — than we found elsewhere. It has a very excellent and spacious playground.

Q. Concerning Lafayette School, Dr. Speer.

A. Lafayette is forty-eight years old, has an insurance value per classroom of $3,373.

Mr. Goodell: While he is making his testimony, would it be better if he designates which are the white schools.

Mr. Greenberg: Dr. Speer, when you describe a school, tell us also whether it's a negro school or white school.

The Witness: Thus far——

By Mr. Greenberg:

Q. Buchanan is what?

A. Colored.

Q. What about Gage?

A. White.

Q. What about Lafayette?

A. Is white. The Lafayette building is forty-eight years old, insured for $3,373. Although not the oldest, this is [fol. 196] certainly one of the poorest buildings in Topeka. The comprehensive plan suggested in 1942 by the planning commission recommended that it be abandoned but it still houses 300 pupils. Small, the auditorium is small, and the playground is small. The kindergarten is fair; books are only fair. There are two fire escapes, but the safety factor is somewhat questionable partly due to the number of children who are housed in the building.

Q. Tell us your findings concerning the McKinley School, Dr. Speer.

A. McKinley is a colored school; it's forty-four years old. It's insured value per available classroom is $2,477. The building was well constructed. It has wooden floors and stairs, which make it something of a fire hazard. It has one fire escape. Approximately three-fourths of the books were too old to be suitable for school use. The comprehensive plan for the City of Topeka, prepared by the City Commissioner——

Mr. Goodell: If the Court please, we object to this witness telling about some book comprehensive plan. It's outside the scope of the issues in this case; secondly, it's not the best evidence; it's hearsay as far as this witness is concerned.

Mr. Greenberg: If the Court please, may I ask Dr. Speer whether such city plans and city surveys are things which [fol. 197] an educator customarily studies in making an evaluation.

Judge Huxman: What comprehensive plan are you referring to, Doctor?

The Witness: I am referring, Your Honor——

Judge Huxman: Bartholomew plan?

The Witness: I am referring, Your Honor, to the one that was mentioned in court this morning that was prepared jointly by the Board of Education, the City Commissioners, and, I think——

Mr. Goodell: Now, if the Court please, that is this witness' idea that it was prepared jointly.

Judge Huxman: That plan was ruled out. We haven't received or permitted any evidence concerning that plan. I think the witness should refrain from reference to this comprehensive plan.

The Witness: This—the site of the McKinley building is not at all attractive and hardly adequate for school purposes. In other words, we might say it has very poor aesthetic value.

BLEED THROUGH

By Mr. Greenberg:

Q. Would you tell us what you found concerning Monroe School?

A. Monroe. Colored building, is twenty-four years old; it's valued at $9,760. This is, in our judgment, the best of the colored buildings. It's well constructed, has tile floors. [fol. 198] Again, however, many of the books are too old for good school use. The site is rather small, and the building and site are not very attractive.

Q. And tell us about what you found concerning Oakland School, Dr. Speer.

A. The Oakland School is white; it's only one year old. It's insured value per available classroom is $23,906. It's a beautiful structure. It's about the last word in school buildings; has modern furniture, asphalt tile floors, acoustical ceilings, good lighting, good heating, darkroom for audio-visual aids, office vault, public address system for use of radio programs, music programs, has a beautiful, large combination auditorium-gymnasium very suitable for community gatherings and parent meetings, large dining and social room with a kitchen adjoining; well adapted for community meetings; has a beautiful kindergarten room with new equipment; the books still not ideal but they are very good. All in all, it's an excellent building that should provide for one of the best educational opportunities.

Q. And tell the Court what you found concerning the Parkdale School.

A. The Parkdale, white, is age twenty-seven, value $8,016. The building appears to have been rather poorly constructed. It has a stucco exterior for the most part. It is [fol. 199] in rather an attractive location with ample playground area. The kindergarten room is quite dull; the books are just fairly good.

Q. And would you do the same concerning the Polk School.

A. The Polk School, for white children, is sixty-four years old; it's the oldest building in Topeka. It's insured value per room is $2,547. It is the oldest building in Topeka, but it is not, in my judgment, the worst building. It is surprisingly substantial, surprisingly attractive on the inside. Has a nice auditorium, two playrooms in the basement, built of native stone; has two fire escapes; the books in the building are very good.

Q. And what did you find concerning the Potwin School?

A. The Potwin School is white, age two years, value per room, $18,100. It's a beautiful building with very modern features. It has a spacious playground which is surfaced with asphalt. It has a beautiful auditorium, also double playrooms. The books are mostly good, at least dating from the 1930's on, mostly. It has a kitchen, a visual aids room. This building seems to be filled to capacity already although only two years old. It is, all in all, one that should provide an excellent educational opportunity.

Q. And what about the Randolph School, Dr. Speer.

A. The Randolph School, a large school, age twenty-four, [fol. 200] value $6,947. It's a large building which is reasonably good. The desks are old, but the books are fairly good, the majority of them dating in the 1940's. It has a very attractive kindergarten with a fireplace and good decorations. It has an excellent, spacious playground. It has a beautiful row of trees which highlight the landscaping. Although it's a little old, this building is still capable of providing a very good educational opportunity. It has a small combination auditorium-gymnasium which is not adequate for the entire enrollment.

Q. Would you please tell the Court what you found concerning State Street School.

A. State Street is a white school, age eleven years, insured value per classroom, $13,880. It's an excellent building, beautifully located, well landscaped; most of the new features, such as a public address system, beautiful auditorium, adequate gymnasium, excellent playground, has a kitchen, library room; the books are fairly good but not in keeping with the building. All in all, the facilities are available to provide a very good educational opportunity, one of the best.

Q. Would you tell the Court what you found concerning Sumner School.

A. The Sumner School is white, age fifteen years, value $15,936 per room. It's another excellent building; beautiful [fol. 201] auditorium, a large good gymnasium, has its public address system; the books are good; very attractive kindergarten. Again, the facilities are available for an excellent educational opportunity.

Q. Would you do the same concerning the Van Buren School.

A. Van Buren is a white school, age forty-one years, value $6,030 per classroom. Although it's an old building, it has steel stairways which eliminates some fire hazard. It has an auditorium and a playroom; has good pictures and good books. The one fire escape, however, is approached through a window on the second floor which might be locked or hard for children to reach in an emergency. However, the building can still provide a fair educational opportunity.

Q. Would you tell the Court what you found concerning the Washington School.

A. Washington is a colored school, thirty-six years old, valued at $6,284. It's a fairly good building in a rather unattractive setting. One room seemed to be set aside for books. The books were fair; better than in most of the colored buildings. The faculty here—there was evidence to lead us to believe that the faculty here were doing the best to make the most of their facilities.

Q. Are there other buildings that you did not visit, Dr. Speer, but concerning which you have data.

[fol. 202] A. Yes, there are, I think, eight other buildings that I have this data on.

Q. Could you rapidly go down that list and tell the Court what data you found.

A. Yes, I will very quickly read age first and value second, if I may.

Central Park, white, thirty-nine years old, $5,160.

Clay, White, twenty-five years old, $12,750.

Grant, thirteen years old, $15,336. Grant is a white school.

Lincoln, a white school, thirty-five years old, $4,610.

Lowman Hill, a white school, forty-eight years old, $5,220.

Quincy, white building, forty-seven years old, $4,040.

Quinton Heights, thirty-eight years old, $3,024.

I might mention here that there is a new building now under construction to be called the Southwest building which, I presume, will be available sometime during the coming year and, by our formula, the insured value per classroom should be about $26,660.

Q. Now, Dr. Speer, you have gone through all the schools [fol. 203] in the City of Topeka, and I would like to ask you some hypothetical questions which I would like you to answer on the basis of your study of the schools in the City of Topeka and on the basis of your knowledge and experience and study as an educator.

I want you to assume the following set of facts, Dr. Speer: That a negro child who lives in Topeka, where there are racially segregated schools, attends the Buchanan School, although if there were not racial segregation in the City of Topeka, because of where he lives, he would otherwise attend the Randolph School, would you say that on the basis of the evidence you have given above and the other factors which I mentioned, that he obtains the same educational opportunity at Buchanan that he would obtain if he attended Randolph?

Mr. Goodell: To which we object as the hypothetical question assumes a fact not proven, and the fact assumes another fact that is contrary to some evidence. The fact it assumes that if the child lived at Randolph and there wasn't racial segregation he would attend Randolph. It assumes that fact. It isn't necessarily so. The child, even if you didn't have segregation, might not prefer to go to Randolph. He might prefer to go to some school where he wasn't outnumbered by fifty to one. Object to the question in the present form because it assumes a hypothe- [fol. 204] tical fact unsupported by any evidence.

Judge Huxman: You may answer, Doctor.

The Witness: The question, as I understand it——

Mr. Greenberg: (To reporter) Would you read it back, please.

(The last preceding question was read by the reporter.)

By Mr. Greenberg:

Q. What is your answer to that question, Dr. Speer?

A. No, I would say he would not get the same educational opportunity for some of the following reasons: First of all, the Buchanan building is an older building; it's thirty years old; Randolph is twenty-four years old. The insured value per classroom for Buchanan is $5,623; for Randolph it's $6,947. To look at some of the details of the buildings, Buchanan has no combined gymnasium-auditorium; Randolph has one that is not completely adequate but it will hold several grades at one time. The furniture——

BLEED THROUGH

Mr. Goodell: Pardon me, I want to interpose another objection, that this has no probative force to show denial of equal protection of the law on this sort of a comparison because he is now demonstrating that because—that an inequality exists because some physical plants are newer [fol. 205] and bigger and better than other physical plants. He is comparing, it's true, with a colored plant, but he is also in the other part of his testimony—he has shown that the same disparity exists between many white schools as to the newer school where we have very old schools, very low cost per capita per room, classroom, and also the testimony very obviously shows no school system in the world could have buildings equal because newer buildings necessarily incorporate modern facilities not known when they were built twenty or thirty years ago.

Mr. Greenberg: May I answer that, Your Honor?

Mr. Goodell: I address that to the Court, not you.

Mr. Greenberg: I didn't ask you whether I could answer it.

Judge Huxman: The witness may answer.

The Witness: Proceeding, on the other hand, we might say that the Randolph building has these features, a much more attractive kindergarten room, more spacious playground, much more attractive surroundings which adds to its aesthetic educational value, and I would add, if I may consult my notes a moment here——

Mr. Greenberg: Go ahead.

The Witness: That the books in the Randolph School are better than the books in the Buchanan building, in [fol. 206] my judgment. There are better heating and lighting in the Randolph building, and I think I would add, Your Honor, that most important of all the curriculum in the Randolph building provides a much better educational opportunity than the one in the Buchanan building, because, in the Randolph building, the colored child would have opportunity to learn to live with, to work with, to cooperate with, white children who are representative of approximately 90% of the population of the society in which he is to live.

By Mr. Greenberg:

Q. Now, Dr. Speer, rather than asking you the same question again, I would like you to answer the same question, comparing the Gage and the Buchanan Schools.

Judge Huxman: Would your answers be substantially the same, based upon substantially the same reasons?

The Witness: Some of the reasons would be the same, Your Honor. However, I believe this particular comparison the difference is greater.

Judge Huxman: Well, would be a difference of degree, otherwise your answer would be the same.

The Witness: Some of the specific details might be different.

Judge Huxman: Does that satisfy you, Mr.——

[fol. 207] Mr. Greenberg: That is all right; that satisfies us, yes.

By Mr. Greenberg:

Q. I would like to ask you the same question concerning a comparison of Sumner and Monroe Schools, Dr. Speer.

A. Sumner and Monroe. Again I would say for some of the same kinds of reasons that the Sumner building would provide a better educational opportunity.

Judge Huxman: May I ask the doctor a question?

Mr. Greenberg: Yes.

Judge Huxman: To be sure I understand his answer, is one of the reasons which is common to all three of these, your reason that they are by segregation denied in all three of these schools the opportunity to mingle and live with the white children, which they would otherwise have and that, to you, is an important factor, is that part of your answer?

BLEED THROUGH

The Witness: Yes, Your Honor, that would enter into all of them.

Judge Huxman: I was quite sure that was it, but I wanted to be clear in my own mind that that was a part of your answer in all of these schools.

By Mr. Greenberg:

Q. Dr. Speer, I would like you to make a similar comparison between State and Washington Schools.

[fol. 208] A. The same curriculum reasons, of course, apply and, in addition, we find, as I stated in earlier testimony, that the State Street School is one of the better schools, and it has many features such as the P. A. system and a beautiful auditorium, an excellent playground, a library room, a kitchen that can be used to provide a considerably better educational opportunity than could be provided in the Washington School.

Mr. Greenberg: Your witness.

Judge Huxman: You may cross examine.

Cross-examination.

By Mr. Goodell:

Q. Dr. Speer, if I understand your testimony correctly, boiled down to—as to the physical facts on the comparison of buildings and facilities feature of it, eliminating the racial feature, is it your opinion that any school, white school, that is considerably older and inferior and a wide disparity as to modern facilities, that that child going to such a white school is likewise being denied an equal opportunity of education?

A. It is unequal in another sense, I would say, if I understand your question correctly. Would you mind repeating the crux of it; I am not sure that I understand you.

Q. What I am trying to say is, eliminating the racial feature and restricting your opinion entirely to comparison of plants, facilities and accessories, will you still [fol. 209] say that a child, a white child, who goes to one of these other schools, such as Lafayette, Quinton Heights, Polk and some of these old schools, and Lowman, are denied equal educational opportunities as against children —as compared to children who live in a territory such as Oakland and Randolph and Potwin and get to go to those new schools.

A. A child might be—might have an inferior educational opportunity in some respects, but he would not have the stigma of segregation, nor be denied the opportunity to mix with the majority group of the population. Also——

Q. I said eliminating that feature of it. Other than that, do you consider that it's an inferior opportunity as far as the white child is concerned so that he is denied an equal opportunity of education, eliminating the racial thing.

A. It might be if all other facilities are equal, but that is an accident of geography.

Q. Well, you made comparisons between some of the best white schools we have here in town to the colored schools, haven't you?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now, while we are on that subject, I will ask you to turn to Exhibit "K", which is the Board of Education's record pertaining to the original cost of these buildings [fol. 210] and also, in the same connection——

A. I don't have a copy of that here, sir.

Q. I will step over here and let you see it. What I have marked on my copy here in red are the negro schools; what I have marked in blue pencil are the white schools; you understand?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now, I will direct your attention, if the schools that were built about the same time, the white schools, as the colored schools, if this exhibit doesn't show the same—practically—outlay of cost and, in some instances, more money spent for structural, or the school, and land acquisition than there were for white schools that were built at that same period of time.

A. I think that may be possible.

Q. Doesn't the exhibit show that, the records of the Board of Education.

A. Which two buildings do you mean?

Q. Well, compare Quinton Heights, which was built in 1913, at a cost of $12,640.

BLEED THROUGH

A. With what?

Q. We will get that in a minute, and McKinley, which was built six years earlier at a cost of $51,000 for the structure.

A. I would say that between 1907 and 1913 building costs might have fluctuated a great deal, and I don't think—[fol. 211] I would not base a comparison on building—on construction cost with that many years intervening. That is why we used insurance costs which are supposed to be current and accurate as prepared by the Board of Education.

Q. Let's compare Lowman Hill, which is a white school built, according to the exhibit, in 1906, with McKinley.

A. May I correct you? It was built in 1901 and an addition in 1906.

Q. All right. Compare that to McKinley School.

A. McKinley School was built in 1907, six years later; again there may have been considerable difference in construction costs over a six-year period. They sometimes change very rapidly to the best cycle and other things.

Q. Let's look at the exhibit on the insurance values; don't you see disparity between the old white schools and the new white schools?

A. That is possible.

Q. On the present insurance table——

Judge Mellott: What is the exhibit on the insurance?

Mr. Goodell: "L".

By Mr. Goodell:

Q. I call your attention specifically to some schools shown on this exhibit and their present insurance values as shown by this exhibit. Quinton Heights has a total [fol. 212] structure insured value of $14,000, doesn't it?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Van Buren has an insured value of $46,800, doesn't it?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. That is a white school. Washington has an insured value of $64,800, doesn't it?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Monroe has an insured value of $112,000, doesn't it?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. So there you have got three white schools, all of which are lower present value than the colored schools, isn't that right?

A. If I may express my view, my basis, you cannot compare building by building on—even on insured cost because some buildings are larger than others. Therefore, the only basis I was able to arrive at was an insured value per available classroom. You have to have some kind of a common yardstick to use on all buildings. For instance, some of those buildings are twice as big as others and, therefore, their value would naturally be proportionately greater.

Q. Do you know of any school system in the United States—not just Topeka—in the United States, that has buildings that are equal, that there isn't great differences based upon when they were built and the needs of the com- [fol. 213] munity at the time they were built?

A. That has not—doesn't have great differences as to their value and commodious quarters and characters that are recognized now in modern education and that are applied in modern buildings, that doesn't have great disparities, those types of buildings, in any school system in the United States with buildings built twenty, thirty or forty years ago.

A. I believe there is very likely to be some disparity, may not be great, and may not be great as compared to this group and this group, but between individual buildings, I am sure you would find some disparity if there is more than one building.

Q. You realize that school buildings are built as a community grows up and population trends—where the town grows and which way it grows determines whether buildings are located and newer buildings are added.

A. That is one factor.

Q. Do you know of any way way on earth to keep those facilities adequate and at the same time equal in any school system?

A. There are ways that it can be approached.

Q. Well, just tell me how you would approach it.

A. By forming a good cooperative city planning with the Board of Education and the City Commissioners on [fol. 214] a long-term scale and then following it.

BLEED THROUGH

Q. Would you recommend that if we had a building like, say in Topeka, that cost $112,000 and is now a sound and structural safe colored building, that you tear that down because we happen to have a new building built a year ago that cost a half million dollars; would you recommend that?

A. Not merely for that reason, no.

Q. What other reasons would you have for tearing it down?

A. If I found that throughout the community the colored children's buildings were decidedly inferior to the buildings of the white schools, then I would consider that to be an unequal educational opportunity between the groups.

Q. Well, now, let's talk about that subject. Let's talk about Quinton Heights and Polk Street and Lafayette School and Lowman School, all of which have a physical plant value at the time they were built and at the present time, an insurance value less than any of the four colored schools. Do you think that makes the white children get inferior education than to the colored children going to those schools?

A. The colored children are getting an inferior education, I think, for this reason: That, as I cited in my original testimony, 45% of the white children can go to schools that are newer than the newest colored building; only 14% [fol. 215] of the white children have to go to schools that are older than the oldest colored building, so it's a comparison of 14% against 45%.

Q. Let's get back on the track. I asked you whether or not, using an illustration of four white schools, if they are inferior as to value, both at the time they were built and now, to the colored schools, do you consider that alone makes the white child that is attending those schools, Quinton Heights, Polk, Lowman and Lafayette, receive in and of itself, receive an inferior education.

A. Not necessarily.

Q. Well, then, why do you say that when you talk about that element as causing the colored child——

A. Because——

Q. Wait just a minute until I ask my question, will you please? Why do you say that when you are talking about a colored child who goes to one of the four colored schools and you compare the plant and facilities to some of the modern buildings—school buildings—in the last two or three years.

A. Because, in the first instance, we are assuming——

Judge Mellott: The witness must wait until the question is completely asked. The reporter can't get it down when you both talk at the same time.

(The last preceding question was read by the re-[fol. 216] porter.)

Judge Mellott: Strike out the answer as partially given.

By Mr. Goodell:

Q. Why do you say in such a situation in making the comparison in the case of a negro child going to one of the four negro schools, comparing it to some of the schools built in the Topeka area, in the Topeka school system in the last two or three or four years, such as Randolph, Potwin and Oakland, that that fact alone gives the negro child an inferior educational opportunity, that would not apply in the case of the children going to the white schools that I have previously mentioned in my other question.

A. In the first instance, if I understand you correctly, I was assuming that other things were equal because of the —as we admitted, the faculty preparation is approximately equal, the class size equal, and so forth. But, in the latter instance, other things are not equal primarily because of the difference in the curriculum which is a very important factor.

Q. All right, now, what is present in the case of the Quinton Heights white school, in the curriculum you talk about, that is not present for comparison purposes in any of the four colored schools?

A. Because in Quinton Heights the child has the opportunity to learn his personal adjustments, his social adjust[fol. 217] ments and his citizenship skills in the presence of a cross-section of the population.

BLEED THROUGH

Q. I asked you to eliminate the racial feature entirely and restrict it to physical things alone; that is what I asked you.

The Witness: If the Court will permit, I don't think that we can answer an educational opportunity purely on physical features. There are too many other elements that are also involved.

Q. Mr. Speer, Professor Speer, I probably misunderstood you. I thought—I understood your testimony to be that because of these physical things that in and of itself, ignoring the racial thing, that that constituted an unequal educational opportunity to the negro child because of these modern buildings that he wasn't allowed to go to; is that correct, or not?

A. It is certainly one of the very important things and, if the other factors are equal, and this one is unequal, then there may be an inequality in the total educational opportunity.

Q. Maybe I am so stupid I can't understand you. Did you not say, is it your opinion, that because of physical factors, and I mean by physical factors differences in plant facilities, of some of the white schools and the four negro [fol. 218] schools, that alone, in and of itself, causes you to give an opinion, and it is your opinion that that child, the negro child, because of that alone, doesn't have equal educational opportunity.

A. That is a contributing factor, but I do not consider that of—that alone.

Q. Then you didn't say that alone caused him to have an unequal opportunity.

A. No, but that coupled with other factors did cause him to have an unequal opportunity.

Q. What are the other factors rather than racial factors.

A. Curriculum factor; there is faculty; there is size of classrooms; there is books——

Q. Let's compare some white schools—let's take Quinton Heights, Lowman, Polk and Lafayette again. What is present as to the faculty, comparing that to the faculty of the four negro schools, that is inferior or that is—there is a disparity.

Mr. Carter: I would like—I think that we have listened to this line of questioning—it seems to us that it is now objectionable. What I apparently gather from the line of examination that is being made is that the—Mr. Goodell is attempting to establish that because there are deprivations of white children that he call off the deprivations of the negro child in segregation. We don't think that is [fol. 219] the issue in the case.

Judge Huxman: This is cross-examination of your expert witness where the latitude is a little greater. You may proceed.

By Mr. Goodell:

Q. Restricting now for this question, I will ask you to compare and point out dissimilarities or disparities between the faculty—one thing alone now—the faculty, that is, the teaching in the four white schools, that is, Quinton, Polk—Quinton Heights, Polk Street, Lowman Hill and Lafayette, to the four negro schools that are in issue in this lawsuit.

A. I can't answer that at the moment, sir. I would have to add up the preparation of the faculties of those four particular schools. I do not have that at hand. I added them up for the entire system and took the entire averages, but I do not have them for those four particular schools.

Q. As far as you know, they are perfectly equal then, is that right?

A. I don't think they could be perfectly equal; that would be impossible.

Judge Huxman: Well, now, that is rather quibbling, of course. Perfect equality you can't find in two teachers any place.

Mr. Goodell: I think so.

The Witness: Yes.

[fol. 220] By Mr. Goodell:

Q. What—is the faculty, then, comparing it to the other factor which you mentioned, curriculum, on the four white schools covered by the illustration and the four negro schools——

A. How does the curriculum compare?

BLEED THROUGH

Q. Yes.

A. Between the two schools. As far as course of study is concerned, as far as I know, it is probably about equal but as far as the total curriculum is concerned, and that is the only basis on which I can discuss it, it is not equal.

Q. What do you mean by total curriculum?

A. I mean the total school experience of the school child, what the instructions, what the books are, what the surroundings of the buildings are, what his associations with the other children are.

Q. Well, eliminating that feature, the associations with the other children, which is the racial feature, what are the other part of the curriculum which is any dissimilarity or inferior factors present in the case of the negro schools and the white schools that I have used for illustration.

A. In professional circles we have a term called the great "gestalt" which means the sum is greater—the whole is greater than the sum of the parts and, when we start taking into account only the parts one by one, we destroy [fol. 221] our "gestalt", and we cannot make a wise comparison.

Judge Mellott: What was that word?

The Witness: (Spelling) G-e-s-t-a-l-t.

By Mr. Goodell:

Q. Now you come from Missouri, don't you?

A. I at present live in Missouri, yes, sir.

Q. You have segregated schools there, don't you?

A. We have some segregated schools. On the university campus we have a mixed school.

Q. I am talking about the public school system in the State of Missouri.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And it is mandatory, isn't that right?

A. I presume in some cases it is.

Q. Have you studied any of the various state statutes over the country which we have had for a half century concerning this segregation of students?

Mr. Carter: Your Honor, I can't see how this——

Mr. Goodell. This is preliminary for another question.

Judge Huxman: I think that is an improper question. Well, as long as it is preliminary, you may answer whether you have or have not studied these various statutes.

Mr. Goodell: I will withdraw the question.

[fol. 222] By Mr. Goodell:

Q. You know in a great many cities and communities of the United States there are statutes similar to the statutes here in Kansas which we have had for a half century or three-fourt-s of a century, isn't that right?

A. I presume so.

Q. You know, as a practical man, laws get passed by legislators coming from the various parts of their communities over the state, don't you?

A. Yes, sir.

Judge Huxman: Mr. Goodell, what is the purpose of that question? What value does that have to our problem how laws are passed?

Mr. Goodell: I am getting to that. I can't ask it all at once. I am trying to get from this witness the feature as to whether he thinks elimination of racial segregation, if it's unwanted by the community and is out of step with the thinking of the community which the mere existence of the laws have some indication——

Judge Huxman: I think Dr. Speer has made it quite clear from his evidence—he has to me at least, if I understand it—that segregation, racial segregation, is the prime and controlling factor of the equality of the whole curriculum, and that these physical factors are secondary, and that his testimony, as it registered with me, is that aside from [fol. 223] racial segregation he perhaps would not testify that there was any such inequality in the physical properties as would deny anybody an equal educational opportunity. Do I understand your testimony correctly?

The Witness: If I may say, Your Honor, I think I would sum up this way: That there is, in my opinion, some inequality in physical facilities between the groups in Topeka, but, in addition to that, there is also the difference of segregation itself which affects the school curriculum.

Judge Huxman: Let's see if I can get myself straightened out. Do you not also agree with what Mr. Goodell is trying to bring out here—you haven't gotten together—that if you put it on that fact, that there is inequality in physical facilities as between the white schools and the colored schools, sometimes the greater facilities are with the colored schools against the older white schools.

The Witness: Yes, Your Honor, but they are not as many in that direction as there are in the other direction in this case.

Judge Huxman: It seems to me we are spending a lot of time on that when that is rather, it seems to me, it would be obvious if you have an older white building [fol. 224] than a colored building that perhaps the physical facilities in the older white building would be poorer than the colored building.

The Witness: Yes, I will agree.

Mr. Goodell: I will try to shorten this up.

By Mr. Goodell:

Q. If I understand you correctly, the basis of your opinion on saying that the mere separation—strike that. It's your opinion, then, that you can't have separate schools in any public school system and have equality, is that right?

A. Yes.

Q. And that is predicated on the—on your philosophy or your theory that merely because the two races are kept apart in the educational process, isn't that right, mere separation causes inequality.

A. That is one of the things which causes inequality, yes, sir.

Q. Yes. Now, assuming, Doctor, that we didn't have separate schools and they were altogether, and you still had a social situation in this community which didn't recoignize co-mingling of the races, didn't admit them on free equality, that child would run against those—run up against those things in his practical every-day world, wouldn't he?

[fol. 225] A. I presume so.

Q. Sir?

A. I would think so.

Q. Wouldn't that tend to cause more of a tempest and emotional strain or psychological impact if he got used to going to school with white children than when he went downtown and couldn't eat in a white restaurant, couldn't go to a white hotel and couldn't do this and that, wouldn't that make the impact greater and accentuate that very thing.

Mr. Greenberg: This witness is qualified as an expert in the field of education, and I don't believe has testified or is qualified to testify concerning segregation all over the State of Kansas or elsewhere.

Mr. Goodell: Well, I restrict it to Topeka.

Judge Huxman: I think the Court will sustain the objection. That is purely argumentative. I doubt whether the doctor has qualified himself.

By Mr. Goodell:

Q. Assuming, Doctor, we will restrict this to the educational process, assuming that—that we didn't have segregation, for the purpose of this question, and assuming further we had a negro child going to Potwin or Oakland or Randolph and assuming that the population trend appears in the schoolroom as it does in our city, so that he would be outnumbered from twenty to fifty to one, assuming all that, for the purpose of this question as being true, [fol. 226] wouldn't that cause some inferiority feeling on the part of the colored child when he went to such a school where he was outnumbered twenty to fifty to one and caused some sort of mental disturbance and upset.

A. On which basis would you rather for me to—on theory or on personal observation or experience?

Q. I am talking about theory here.

A. And personal observation and experience.

Q. Yes.

A. Let me first mention the latter one; we have adjoining our campus a demonstration school of 210 students in the elementary grades and mixed in with them are about ten negro children, so they are outnumbered in that proportion, and my observation is, and the reports I receive from my assistants are, that those children are very happy, very well adjusted, and they are there voluntarily. They don't have to attend.

Mr. Elisha Scott: I object to that.

Judge Huxman: Mr. Scott, are you entered here as an attorney of record?

Mr. Elisha Scott: I am supposed to be.

Judge Huxman: Go ahead.

Mr. Elisha Scott: I object to that because he is invading the rights, and he is answering a question not based upon [fol. 227] the evidence adduced or could be adduced.

Mr. Goodell: You just got here; you wouldn't know.

Mr. Elisha Scott: Yes I do know.

Judge Huxman: Objection will be overruled. You may answer.

The Witness: Shall I repeat the answer?

By Mr. Goodell:

Q. Have you finished?

A. I think, also, on the basis of our knowledge of child behavior that we can say on a short-range basis there may be occasionally, the first time we jump into water we may be a little bit frightened, but, on a long-range basis, we generally are able to work out our adjustments and make a good situation out of it.

Q. Segregation occurs, doesn't it, Doctor, in any school system among the races. I mean by that, children that come from wealthy families co-mingle with children from poor families; they go off into different cliques; that occurs, doesn't it?

A. It occurs sometimes.

Q. Occurs frequently, doesn't it?

A. Well, it all depends on your definition.

Q. And the child that is left out of the swim, so to speak, he feels inferior or second-class, doesn't he?

A. Yes, and I think we should prevent that in all cases [fol. 228] possible.

Q. You wouldn't make a new social order to prevent social strata of society, would you?

Judge Huxman: Just a minute. The Court will sustain an objection to that question.

By Mr. Goodell:

Q. Have you made a survey of any of the students that have gone to our segregated schools, the negro students, and picked them up to see what effect to their education that you call attention to as being inferior, how it's worked out in every-day life.

A. I have talked to a few of them, but I have not made a survey of them.

Q. Have you heard of anybody getting hired or a professional man having a plant or a businessman having a customer based upon what elementary school he went to in the first grade or the second grade or the sixth grade for that matter?

A. Oh, probably not, but probably there are cases where a person is hired or not hired on the basis of the kind of education he received in the first six grades.

Q. You don't know a thing about our community and how the negro child, when he goes through our school system, how he is received in the business world at all, do you?

A. Oh, I have known Topeka for some years. I may have a little knowledge.

[fol. 229] Q. Do you know anything about that?

A. A little, not too much.

Q. What?

A. I don't know too much about it.

Q. Do you know that in the case of the junior high grades and in the senior high grades that they are not segregated?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you think, getting back to the school system and the illustration of where the negro child would go to a school where he would be outnumbered twenty to fifty to one, and he wasn't recognized because of pure majority rule and wasn't elected head of his class or class officers or recognized in the various school activities, that that would have any impact on such a child.

A. Not as much impact as having been denied even to get into the running.

Q. You think if you got in the school and left out entirely he would feel happy about it, would he?

A. What's that again?

Q. You think if the negro child was simply by edict of law forced into the white school, whether the white school was ready to receive him or not, and however much he was in the minority and however much he would be left out of things, he would still be happy merely because he had found his way into the white school, is that right?

BLEED THROUGH

[fol. 230] A. I think on a long-range plan he would be happier than on the other way.

Mr. Goodell: That's all.

Mr. Carter: Your Honor, may we have a five-minute recess?

Judge Huxman: Yes. The court will take a ten-minute recess.

(The court then, at 2:40 o'clock p. m., stood at recess until 2:50 o'clock p. m., at which time court was reconvened and the following further proceedings were had:)

Mr. Goodell: I would like to recall Dr. Speer for two short questions.

Judge Huxman: Dr. Speer, take the witness stand for a question or two further.

Hugh W. Speer, having been previously sworn, reassumed the stand and testified further as follows:

By Mr. Goodell:

Q. Dr. Speer, in giving your opinion here a moment ago as to the comparison based upon library books—library or books in certain of the negro—in the negro schools to certain of the white schools covered by your testimony, did you consider, in forming that opinion, the fact that the Par-
[fol. 231] ent Teachers Association in the various school territories contribute personally and raise the money to buy those books, and they are not furnished by the Board of Education.

A. Yes, I have been informed that that is sometimes the case.

Q. Well, how did you segregate which books have been bought by Parent Teachers Association and the books that have been furnished by the Board of Education?

A. I didn't make that separation. I felt that by neglect the Board of Education permitted an inequality to exist.

Q. Now, did you also—strike that. State whether or not any of the books in any of the libraries or rooms in the schools that you made the investigation concerning books, that at the end of the term the books, some of them, were gone, that is, packed up in boxes.

A. Yes, we understood that, and we also understood that some of the books are regularly kept in the central office of the Board of Education, and we took that into account, knowing that the same—those books are taken out of all the schools and kept in the Board of Education, so that what remained are really the comparable—form the basis for comparison.

Q. So if some of the books were missing, either being packed up or gone, and you didn't know what they were, you are just basing your testimony, your considered opin-[fol. 232] ion, on what you found, is that right?

A. Sir, the books that were gone are the books that circulate among all the buildings in the course of the year, so we assume that those are equal. It's the books that are left in the building that really belong to that building, and it is on that basis that we made our differential.

Q. Were some of them packed up?

A. Some of them packed up, and we looked into the boxes.

Q. Did you take them all out volume by volume and examine them?

A. We did not examine every book in the Topeka school system, but we sampled it in an unbiased way. We sampled a large number of rooms and a large number of buildings and a large number of boxes, but we did not examine every book.

Q. You mean you took a book out here and there from a box and, from that, made up your mind that they were all alike and, consequently, that is the way you got at your opinion.

A. No, sir. We took sampling in a scientific way.

Q. What do you mean scientific way?

BLEED THROUGH

A. We took a sample that was representative and large enough to where we could feel confident in it.

Judge Huxman: Is that all?

By Mr. Goodell:

Q. Which books were bought in the various schools that you gave your opinion about—were bought by the Parent [fol. 233] Teachers Association?

A. I don't know just which books. Some, no doubt, were but not a great many. It is not enough to affect the percentage very much.

Q. If you don't know what books they were, some of the books you didn't even examine, you don't know what quantity they are, how do you get at an opinion as to book facilities at the various schools?

A. On this basis, sir, that it is the books in the school that are responsible for the education of the child, and we examined the books in the school and, on that basis, we made our opinion.

Q. So what you are saying, if I understand you right, the books you found and examined showed less books or inferior quality as to date and so forth in the colored schools than the books you found in the white schools, is that right?

A. Yes, sir.

Mr. Goodell: All right.

Judge Huxman: Step down.

James H. Buchanan, having been first duly sworn, assumed the stand and testified as follows:

Direct examination.

By Mr. Greenberg:

[fol. 234] Q. Dr. Buchanan, will you tell the Court your full name, please.

A. James H. Buchanan.

Q. Please tell the Court something of your educational background.

A. At the present time I am Director of the Graduate Division, Kansas State Teachers College, and acting head of the Department of Education. The year preceding this year I was associate professor of education at the Kansas State Teachers College. Six years preceding that time, from 1943 to 1949, I was superintendent of schools at Boulder, Colorado. From 1933 to 1943 superintendent of schools in Lamar, Colorado, and, from 1930 to '33, superintendent of schools at La Jara, Colorado, and, from 1928 to 1930, superintendent of schools in Boyero, Colorado.

Q. Dr. Buchanan, what degrees do you hold and where were they earned?

A. I hold an A.B. Degree from Denver University, 1928; Master of Arts Degree, University of Colorado, 1932; I have had three years—three summers of graduate study at Harvard University, 1936, 1938, 1939, and a Doctor of Education Degree from the University of Colorado, 1949.

Q. Have you visited any of the schools in the City of Topeka?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you visit the Buchanan School?

[fol. 235] A. Yes, I did.

Q. Gage, Lafayette?

A. Yes.

Q. McKinley?

A. Yes.

Q. Monroe?

A. Yes.

Q. Parkdale?

A. Yes.

Q. Polk?

A. Yes.

Q. Potwin?

A. Yes.

Q. Randolph?

A. Yes.

Q. State Street?

A. Yes.

BLEED THROUGH

Q. Sumner?
A. Yes.
Q. Van Buren?
A. Yes.
Q. Washington?
A. Yes.

Q. Did you observe the general appearance of the interior, exterior and the surrounding areas about the school? [fol. 236] A. I did.

Q. Would you describe what you noticed with regard to these factors in the Randolph School.

A. Well, I would say that the Randolph School was situated in a very average residential section; perhaps above average. I think the school is a well-constructed building; it shows good signs of being in a very good state of repair, I should say, and the maintenance in it has been excellent. The facilities in it, such as auditorium, the classrooms and so on, are adequate to a good educational program. I would say the grounds are ample for proper play and recreation for the pupils.

Q. Would you tell us what you found concerning these factors at the Buchanan School, Dr. Buchanan.

A. I would say that the Buchanan School is an older school. It has been well constructed. The walls are in a good state of preservation; redecoration seems to have been done within a reasonable time and the maintenance is equally good. I think in the maintenance you have to take into consideration the age of the building, but I would say it was very good at the Buchanan School. The playground, it would seem to me, was ample for recreational facilities. I think there was no auditorium in the Buchanan School, but it was my impression that adequate precautions have been made for prevention of fire or escape from the building [fol. 237] in case of fire.

Q. I don't recall, Dr. Buchanan, did you say anything concerning the surrounding areas of the Buchanan School?

A. Yes, I would say the surrounding area, as I observed it, being a stranger to the city, practically so, was not quite as substantial; certainly not as substantial a residential area as I would say around the Randolph School.

In other words, I would say it would reflect the general community in which it was associated, perhaps both in age and state of preservation of the building.

Q. Would you tell us what you found concerning the Gage School, Dr. Buchanan.

A. Well, the Gage School is a very fine school. I would say, speaking from memory, I would say it's within a few years of the age of the Randolph School. I have the impression it's somewhat larger. It had some very good pictures on the wall; the walls were in a good state of preservation; there was some repair work going on. There were some rooms in which they needed some repair work and were planning on doing it immediately because there were materials placed outside the doors and, in some places, the floors were up. I would say that the playground and the landscaping is quite attractive and quite beautiful; a very nice piece of work.

Q. Would you tell us, now, what you found concerning [fol. 238] the Sumner School.

A. The Sumner School is a newer school than Gage. I think it's perhaps about ten or eleven years old. It has quite ample—very spacious suitable classroom facilities and a nice auditorium. I think the landscaping would be nothing that anyone could take particular objection to. The general appearance of the building, I should say, was in keeping with a good school situation.

Q. Will you now tell us what you found concerning the Monroe School, Dr. Buchanan.

A. I would say the Monroe School would compare fairly well in construction, in appearance, with the Randolph School, I would rather carry them in mind. I think the Monroe School, I woud say, is about twenty-four, twenty-five years of age. It has fireproof stairways. It shows sign of good care and good maintenance and quite serviceable, I should say, for a number of years. The playground and the landscaping in front of the building is about in keeping with the community in which it is located, I should say. In other words, I would say it is a credit to the community.

Q. And would you tell the Court about the State Street School?

BLEED THROUGH

A. Yes. I saw the State Street School. It is a very good school, I should say; it's more or less in a class with the Sumner School, perhaps a little more modernistic, a [fol. 239] little more in keeping with modern design and the demands of modern education. The playground or the grounds that were vacant, which I assume were available for the children, I thought were quite adequate and quite spacious for a large enrollment. It had auditorium facilities and other features of that kind that make for a good educational situation.

Q. Would you tell us something about the area surrounding the State Street School.

A. I would say that it was quite a creditable residential section.

Mr. Goodell: I didn't hear that.

The Witness: I say it was quite a creditable residential section; very good residential section.

By Mr. Greenberg:

Q. Would you tell us what you found concerning the Washington School, Dr. Buchanan?

A. Well, the Washington School is an older school; I think it is not so old as the Buchanan School; at least that is my impression of it. It has been well cared for. It has an auditorium which, I would assume, for an enrollment of 150, 160 children, would be adequate for them. The maintenance there is quite a creditable thing. I would say that was characteristic of the Topeka schools. There were fourteen I visited; I would say the maintenance and repairs were quite good.

[fol. 240] Q. In your visit to the fourteen schools, Dr. Buchanan, did you make any general observations concerning the areas in which they exist?

A. I think I have already implied that in the answers that I have given. My observation would be that the schools visited, the fourteen of the twenty-two schools, reflect the communities in which they are located, that is, if they are like, well, Polk, perhaps Buchanan, Gage; the varying degrees of the quality of the school is somewhat dependent upon the age of the residential region or section of the city in which they are located. That is, you would find the better schools in the places that are comparatively newer and better developed; that would be my general observation. The poorer schools were perhaps in a region, we might say, have longer been a residential region or area of the city, which is tending, perhaps, to slide down just a bit in quality.

Q. Can you make any general statement concerning the negro schools which you saw and the areas in which they live, Dr. Buchanan.

A. My general statement would be merely to say that they reflect the situation which I have outlined. I think they show a very good care. I think, for instance, the Monroe School, is a school that definitely looks the way you would expect; I think anyone who has had experience [fol. 241] in examining or visiting schools would say that it looks about the way you would expect it to look when you see it from the outside and when you go in. It has been well cared for. All of the schools in Topeka I was impressed by the fact that there was a minimum amount of marking on the walls or disfiguring of the walls or furniture in any way, either in the white schools or the colored schools.

Q. Did you make any general observation concerning the areas in which these colored schools existed, Doctor?

A. I would say, in general, they probably are in the areas which were not the best residential section of the city. I don't know that they would be the poorest, but they were not in the best residential section, and I think there was some variation there. I thought I observed some variation in the quality of the residential section.

Q. Dr. Buchanan, in evaluating the quality of education which a student obtains when attending school, does an educator consider the physical characteristics of the school; I mean their appearance and the appearance which they present to the child, along with the appearance of the area in which the school exists. Is there a direct correlation between that and educational opportunity?

A. Yes, I think that is true. I think the educator—educators do recognize the relationship between the quality [fol. 242] of the building, landscaping of the grounds, the area in which it is placed as an important factor in education.

Q. Now, bearing that criterion in mind, Dr. Buchanan, I would like you to make several comparisons. I want you to assume in the City of Topeka a negro child would attend Randolph School, if there were not racial segregation in the city, but is compelled to attend Buchanan because of racial segregation. Would you say that if all other factors in the City of Topeka and in the schools were equal, except these factors concerning appearance, residential area, and so forth which you have just described in answer to a previous question, if all factors were equal except those factors, would the child attending Buchanan obtain the same educational opportunities that he would obtain if he attended Randolph?

A. I believe no; my answer would be that he would not receive the same educational opportunity.

Q. Well, bearing in mind the correlation which you stated between educational opportunity and physical appearance and area, would you explain the reason for your answer?

A. I believe that education is best facilitated when it is in a beautiful environment, where there is a building which pupils can take pride in and where they have beautiful landscaping and the interior of the building is a place where there are the maximum number of modern facilities [fol. 243] to facilitate a good curriculum.

Q. And to the estent that these are different, you would say that the opportunity to learn is different.

A. Beg pardon; would you——

Q. Would you say that to the extent that these are different, the opportunity to learn is different?

A. Yes, I think it has a relationship to the opportunity, yes.

Q. Is this supported by the authorities in the field of education, Dr. Buchanan?

A. I am certain it is, yes, sir.

Q. Did you say yes?

A. I am certain that it is, yes.

Q. Could you state any authorities who support this view?

A. Well, I think that my number of authorities, for instance, Dr. Reeder of Ohio State University in his recent publication on administration, "Public Education of the United States" which came from the press in 1951, just a few months ago, a revision of his book, makes that very clear. He makes that statement that the quality of a building, its setting, is an important factor in the education of a child. Strayer and Englehart, of Columbia University, who are recognized as the leading authorities in schoolhouse construction, hold that view and numerous others.

Judge Mellott: You drop your voice, and I usually get [fol. 244] most excepting the last two or three words. You drop your voice, and I can't hear you.

The Witness: I am sorry; I thought I had a very strong voice.

Judge Mellott: You do, but you don't keep it up.

By Mr. Greenberg:

Q. Dr. Buchanan, I am going to ask you to make three more comparisons without going into as much detail, if you believe the detail you stated concerning the first comparison applies to the following schools: I would like you to compare Gage against Buchanan with regard to these criteria.

A. I would say that Gage very obviously is a better school than Buchanan.

Q. On the basis of the criterion you stated?

A. Yes.

Q. I would like you to compare Sumner against Monroe.

A. Obviously Sumner is a better school than Monroe; a more up-to-date school, a newer school, as I have indicated.

Q. I would like you to compare State Street School against Washington Street School with regard to these criteria.

A. State Street is a better school than Washington School in terms of age, in the terms of these things we have talked about.

Mr. Greenberg: Your witness.

BLEED THROUGH

[fol. 245] Cross-examination.

By Mr. Goodell:

Q. Dr. Buchanan, if I understand you correctly, you are stating that the plant or the building is a very important factor in the educational opportunity.

A. Yes.

Q. The building a child goes to.

A. Yes, indeed.

Q. And, therefore, where you have one building with shrubbery around it and landscaping, which is pretty, and another building built earlier many years ago which isn't as pretty, even however strong and commodious and sufficient, if it isn't as pretty and big and new and as modern, that educational opportunity is minimized in the child that goes to that building, is that right?

A. That would be—other factors being equal, I would say the better one——

Q. I am restricting it to that factor if I understood your testimony.

A. That's right; I would say that that would be detracting from it.

Q. The only way children in any community could have an equal educational opportunity would be to have buildings all beautiful, built about the same time, all modern, all beautifully landscaped and everything just about alike, [fol. 246] isn't that right?

A. As far as that factor is concerned, that is correct.

Q. As a practical matter, don't you realize that we live in a practical world?

A. I have lived in it for nearly fifty years.

Q. How do you think any Board of Education could have all of their buildings built at the same time, same landscaping——

Judge Huxman: You need not answer that question; that is argumentative, has no probative value.

By Mr. Goodell:

Q. Well, according to your theory, if I understand it right, if I went to a little country schoolhouse, even though I had good teaching and good texts and all other facilities, but not a building as good as Randolph, I was in a bad way, or anybody would be in a bad way, to get an education, is that right?

A. No, that isn't my theory. My theory would be you would get a better education if you had better equipment, but you would not—I wouldn't say you would have a poor education because you went to a poorer building. You might have a very superior teacher or you might have very superior ability yourself.

Q. Buildings don't make the educated child, does it?

A. I wouldn't say entirely, no; they are a contributing factor, but not the entire thing.

[fol. 247] Q. You compared the negro schools to Gage and Randolph and Sumner, I believe those three.

A. I think so.

Q. Now, would you please compare those same schools, I mean those white schools; they are all white schools, aren't they?

A. Yes.

Q. —with the schools of Lafayette and Quinton Heights and Polk and Lowman and Quincy.

A. Well, I didn't visit all you have named, but——

Q. Which did you visit?

A. Lafayette. I visited——

Q. Didn't you know we had those others?

A. Yes, but——

Q. You didn't get around to them.

A. We didn't get around to them. I would say that Lafayette compared with Gage or Randolph or Sumner would be far inferior.

Q. Far inferior.

A. Far inferior to it.

Q. We are discriminating then against a child that lives in that territory if he goes to Lafayette as against a child that lives—goes to Gage.

Judge Huxman: That is immaterial and need not be answered.

[fol. 248] Mr. Goodell: No further questions.

Judge Huxman: Anything else of this witness? Doctor, you may stand aside.

(Witness excused.)

BLEED THROUGH

R. S. B. ENGLISH, having been first duly sworn, assumed the stand and testified as follows:

Direct examination.

By Mr. Greenberg:

Q. Will you please tell the Court your full name, Mr. English.

A. Horace B. English.

Q. What is your occupation, Mr. English?

A. I am professor of psychology at the Ohio State University.

Q. Would you tell the Court something about your background and the degrees you hold.

A. I took my Bachelor's Degree at Oxford University, and there I also took a certificate in cultural anthropology. Later I took the Ph.D. Degree at Yale. As for my experience, I have been teaching and doing research work since 1916. I have been a full professor since 1921. During the war I was—during the first war I was psychological examiner and then chief of the re-education service in one of the hospitals. In the second world war I was a consultant on personnel problems part time for the Adjutant General's Office of the Army and then immediately after the surrender [fol. 249] I was a morale analyst in Japan. I then—I have had a number of part-time positions; I was consultant for the Forest Service on human relations. I was consultant to the West Virginia Department of Education on the curriculum in their state teachers colleges. I was chairman of the counsel on human relations appointed by the American Association for the Advancement of Science, for work with the Conservation Departments of the government, and I spent some six months in the study and research in the field of child development under the auspices of the American Council on Education.

Q. Have you ever held office in, or been a member of, any learned societies?

A. Yes, in the American Psychological Association I am a Fellow; I have been a member of the Council of Directors, and I have been chairman of the Committee on Professional Ethics of that association. At the moment I am president of the Division of Educational Psychology of that association. In 1940 I was president of the American Association for the Advancement of Science—for the American Association for Applied Psychology, and I have been president of the Ohio State Psychologists and the Midwestern Psychological Association. And I am a Fellow of the British Psychological Society and member of the Executive Committee of the Psychology Section of the American As- [fol. 250] sociation for the Advancement of Science.

Q. Have you ever published any books or articles in the field of education and psychology, Dr. English?

A. Published with Victor Ramey, of the University of Colorado, a book on studying the individual school child. Just this year brought out a textbook on child psychology, and I have published something around 150 articles in professional journals.

Q. Have you ever made any studies bearing on the capacities of different groups to profit by education?

A. Yes. As a matter of fact my first research, which was begun in 1912, was addressed to this very thing; the results were published in 1918. Then I was also on the team which brought out the celebrated alpha test of intelligence in the United States Army, as I helped with the experimental work which lead to that; and I have been continuously occupied in the field of individual differences and of group differences, and I teach that subject at the Ohio State University. Then I also supervise somewhere between 75 and 100 students a year who make case studies of individual children and I may add some of these are always negro children. I have done some research studies in the field of attitudes, including two of them concerning the attitudes of negroes and, finally, in this list I have done a rather prolonged [fol. 251] series of experiments in the field of learning with special reference to how children learn in school, rather than mere laboratory learning.

Q. Dr. English, have you told me all the courses that you now teach at Ohio State University?

A. No; I teach chiefly individual differences, child psychology and the more practical aspects of learning, rather than theoretical, and I also teach the theory of personality. Those are the main courses.

BLEED THROUGH

Q. Dr. English, at this point I want to ask you a hypothetical question. I want you to assume that in the City of Topeka there is a body of white school children and a body of negro school children, and that there is also racially enforced segregation in the schools. Would you say that on the basis of your learning, experience and study that on the basis of color alone there is a difference in their ability to learn?

A. No, there certainly is not.

Q. Would you tell me, the support for your statement.

A. Well, in the first place, we don't have racial groups learning; we have individuals learning and in both groups, white and negro, we have some persons who are very good learners; we have some persons who are very poor learners, and we have some medium learners. You can break that down to as fine a point as you like; the range is exactly [fol. 252] the same. Well, I say that, as a matter of fact, with regard to school children in respect to the I. Q. which is the best single measure of a child's ability to learn. The best I. Q. on record is that of a negro girl who has no white blood as far as that can be told at all, but right after this child there are four white children, so, you see, it's—at the top it's quite equal and at the bottom it's quite equal and in the middle it's quite equal. It's a matter of individuals and not a matter of groups. So knowing only the color you can't predict at all how well a child can learn. If a child is white you can't tell from that fact alone how well that child will learn in comparison with a group of negro children and, of course, vice versa from the fact that a child is a negro you can't tell how well he will learn with respect to a group of white children. From color alone there is no telling. We know that the negro child, moreover, learns in the same way, that he uses the same process in learning and learns the same things, but I do want to make one exception; it's a notable exception: If we din it into a person that it is unnatural for him to learn certain things, if we din it into a person that he is incapable of learning, then he is less likely to be able to learn.

Q. That difference is not based upon any inherent quality.

A. Not at all. It's a parallel exactly the way it is with [fol. 253] women learning mathematics. There is sort of a superstition that women are naturally incapable of learning mathematics, and so they don't, most of them, learn it. They can, if they will, and some of them do, but there is a tendency for us to live up to, perhaps I should say to live down to the social expectation . . . to learn what we think people say we can learn, and . . . l segregation definitely depresses the negroes expectancy and is therefore prejudicial to his learning. If you get a child in the attitude that he is somehow inferior, and he thinks to himself, "Well, I can't learn this very well.", then he is unlikely to learn it very well.

Q. Dr. English, is there any other scientific evidence to support this conclusion which you have stated other than what you have said.

A. Yes, there is a good deal. For example, in the last war we took the people who were illiterates. These, of course—a good many more of them were colored than white, but we put them into schools to teach them fourth-grade literacy and, as a matter of fact, 87% of the negroes and 84% of the whites successfully completed the work of these schools. Now I don't make anything of the difference of 3% in favor of the negroes as compared with the white. That is, of course, within the range of accidental error, but I say these results do show that under favorable conditions [fol. 254] and under conditions of motivation where these men wanted to learn, the negro men proved that they could learn as well as the whites. Most of the scientific evidence concerns intelligence testing, which, as I said a moment ago, is the best single measure of the ability to learn, and the scientific question that we would ask is, "Are there differences in intelligence which we find? Are these differences due to race or are they due to unequal opportunities?" and the whole trend of the evidence, beginning with the work in 1912, but especially beginning after the first world war when we analyzed the scores of the recruits in the first world war, the whole trend of the evidence is this, and there are no real exceptions to this trend, that wherever we try to equalize the opportunities, we minimize or extinguish the differences in learning ability as between the two racial groups. Perhaps the best study of this is Dr. Klineberg's study showing the results of the migration to New York

BLEED THROUGH

City of children from the deep south. He found—of course we all know that the schools in the south, and particularly the negro schools in the south, are by and large inferior. There are some cities in the south where the schools are very good, but the general tendency, and especially in the rural regions, is for the educational opportunities in the south to be very bad and particularly bad for negroes. [fol. 255] These things are well known in educational circles. So the negroes then coming out of these very poor school situations had very low ability to learn. They seemed stupid and their intelligence test scores were low. But each year that they were in the more favorable learning opportunities in the north, their intelligence quotient was rising, and the longer they were in that favorable region the more their intelligence rose, so that the conclusion is unavoidable that their previous condition was due to the unfavorable opportunities.

Q. Dr. English, is there any scientific evidence to the contrary?

A. Very little indeed and such little evidence as there is doesn't stand up. Now, for example, there was a study by a man named Tanzer, worked with Canadian negroes in a place in Ontario. They went to the same school with the whites, and the whites were, as a group, somewhat better than the negroes. But in this study when we reanalyze the data we found that the negroes were of lower economic status, and we know that lower economic status affects these things, and we found that the negro children went to school less often. In the white group the attendance was 93 and in the colored group it was 84% of the time. With a loss of schooling like that and coming from an inferior group, the tendency is to think that the difference found was [fol. 256] attributable to these unfavorable factors, rather than the race itself. Certainly these factors that I mention were a contributing cause, and I don't say they are the whole thing; they themselves reflect the whole tissue of social circumstances which somewhat discouraged negro learning, and this is a rather typical sample of the few, the relatively few, studies which even seem to point in the opposite direction. The overwhelming tendency is all in the direction of my first statement. May I summarize that?

It seems to me that what we have here is that the segregation tends to create—first of all, segregation seemingly is based upon a fallacy of a difference and then by the mere fact of segregation it turns around and creates the very difference which it assumes to have been present to begin with, and we get into a vicious circle.

Q. Dr. English, I would like to ask you another hypothetical question now, and I would like you to answer on the basis of your experience and learning as an educational psychologist. I want you to assume that a negro child lives within a few blocks of a school; that he lives a much greater distance from another school, which is a negro school which he is compelled to attend on the basis of race; that he spends perhaps a half hour, perhaps more, perhaps an hour or two a day travelling to and from school, whereas if he were not compelled to attend this negro school he [fol. 257] would spend a few minutes, perhaps fifteen or twenty minutes, a day going to and from school. Would you say that if all other factors were equal that he would receive the same benefits from attending the negro school as he would from attending the white school?

A. Definitely not.

Q. Give us the reasons.

A. May I say—perhaps your question is, you say from attending the negro school. May I broaden it, from his education, if the Court will permit that extension because it's the whole education of the child which is being damaged here. The education of the child is not wholly in the classroom. The education of the child goes on on the playground, in playing with his equals and his fellows, around home. This is one of the most important things for the wholesome development of the child and, when you take an hour a day from a child, you are taking away something very precious to his total education. I have had this in my own home because one of my children had to go to quite a distant school because of a physical handicap, and we could see the results upon his development of this deprivation. It was one of those things we couldn't help. I gather that what you are talking about is something that we could help if it were not for the presence of the law.

BLEED THROUGH

[fol. 258] Q. Is there any scientific data supporting this opinion which you have just given, Dr. English?

A. It would be very hard to find it, for me to recall it. It's one of those things which has such universal consent that I can't recall it ever being challenged. I am sure we see in our clinics all the time, as we examine children who are disadvantaged and who are maladjusted, we see all the time the evidence of the children who do not get out and play with others. As a matter of fact, I don't think there is any—I am sure there is no psychologist, no child psychologist in the country who would challenge the statement that there is—that the child's play is of the utmost importance and should not be unnecessarily diminished.

Mr. Greenberg: That is all.

Cross-examination.

By Mr. Goodell:

Q. Dr. English, this opinion you have rendered is somewhat founded upon theory, is it not?

A. No, sir, it is based upon literally thousands of experimental studies.

Q. How many cases have you taken, for example, of children that have gone to segregated schools and followed them through—you yourself—and examined their situation in adult life.

A. Well, now to what answer of mine is that addressed. I [fol. 259] thought you were asking me about the question of individual differences.

Q. No.

A. What are you asking them about.

Q. Have you personally conducted a survey or supervised a survey where you took cases of children that had gone through, negro children, that had gone through segregated schools and examined them in their adult life to determine whether or not the fact that they had gone to segregated schools had any bearing or relation to their success or achievement record.

A. I don't believe that I testified on that point, did I?

Q. I didn't say you did. I am asking you if you have ever done such a thing.

A. I have not done such a thing. I am not sure that it's relevant at all to my testimony.

Q. Well, is it possible that you could be in error in some of your conclusions here? Could you be mistaken about some of them?

A. Every man can be mistaken; certainly I can.

Q. You could be mistaken, couldn't you?

A. Oh, yes.

Q. Have you given this expert testimony around the country in cases such as this?

A. No, sir, never before; I teach it.

[fol. 260] Q. Now, Doctor, the ideal state, if I understand your testimony, that you testified in your opinion to, would be where you had no segregation as far as educational process.

A. I don't think I said anything about the ideal state.

Q. Well, it would be better, in other words, is that right?

A. I certainly believe that things would be better if we had no segregation, but that is not an expert opinion; that is my personal opinion. I didn't testify to that.

Q. Well, I mean restricting it to the educational process is what I meant.

A. Yes, without any doubt.

Q. Would you—would it change your opinion any if the facts present in this community were that the child, the negro child, that we are dealing with, if he went to a white school he would be outnumbered ten to one or fifty to one.

A. Not at all. I have seen that happen. I have grown up in schools where that happened myself. I have seen it happen repeatedly. We have it in our own city.

Q. Don't you think there is a general tendency, forgetting the racial thing, for the majority to rule and operate the thing that they belong to.

A. In what sense "majority"?

Q. Well——

A. Racial majority?

[fol. 261] Q. Assuming you had 500 white children going to Randolph School and ten negro children. What would be the natural tendency, taking into account the human element and human equations of whether the negro children would run that school or participate actively in the student activities or whether it would be run by the white students?

A. Well, of course, the majority would generally have a preponderant voice if they divided along racial lines which they tend to do, but which they do not invariably do. I have seen many cases where the colored child receives in a mixed school from the majority group considerable amount of status and honor. You may recall just recently a man was elected captain of the football team in a predominantly white school. I think it was Williams or Amherst, I am not quite sure which, and this is reproduced all the way through our school systems where we do have mixed schools.

Q. And there are some outstanding negroes in different fields of professions and—who have received their—part of their education—in the deep south in segregated schools.

A. That is true.

Q. And yet have achieved great places of importance, isn't that right?

A. Education isn't the whole answer to ability; it is merely one factor. There are men who are big enough, [fol. 262] white or black, to rise above unfavorable circumstances.

Q. Surely. You are familiar, of course, as an educator, with the experience that was had back in the reconstruction days, sometimes referred to as the carpet-bagger days in the south.

A. Very definitely.

Q. You realize that a certain element, radical element I would call it, of the Republican party, perhaps to gain some political advantage, decided to go down in the various states and abolish certain segregation; you realize that was done.

A. Well, there wasn't exactly segregation at that time, but they did go down there and set up some laws of one sort or another, yes.

Q. Which attempted, in one swoop, to eliminate all of their custom and usages of those communities in the south, didn't it?

A. I am not here as an expert on history, but I read history that way, yes.

Q. Surely. Don't you realize that the experience of that period was that they had a tremendous amount of trouble, tremendous amount of emotional outburst and that it caused a great deal of strife between the races and didn't work at all.

[fol. 263] A. Well, if the Court wants a layman's opinion on history, I will answer that question to the best of my knowledge as a layman on history; I am not here as a historian.

Judge Huxman: It seems to me the question is going far afield.

Mr. Goodell: That is all.

Judge Huxman: Any further questions of the doctor? If not, you may step down, doctor.

(Witness excused.)

Wilbur B. Brookover, having been first duly sworn, assumed the stand and testified as follows:

Direct Examination.

By Mr. Greenberg:

Q. Mr. Brookover, will you please state your full name.

A. Wilbur B. Brookover.

Q. What is your occupation?

A. I am a social psychologist by profession. The position I now hold is professor of social science, sociology, at Michigan State College.

Q. What degrees do you hold, Mr. Brookover?

A. I hold an A.B. Degree from Manchester College, a Master of Arts Degree and a Doctor of Philosophy Degree in sociology and psychology from the University of Wisconsin.

Q. Are you a member of any learned societies, Doctor?

[fol. 264] A. I am a member of the American Sociological Society, Society for Applied Anthropology, Society for the Psychological study of Social Issues, the High Valley

BLEED THROUGH

Sociological Society, Michigan Academy of Science, the American Association for the Advancement of Science.

Q. What is your field of special interest, Dr. Brookover?

A. I am particularly concerned in my teaching and research in the field of social psychology with particular reference to the human relations in the school society, or the school as a social institution and in relations between minority groups and majority groups in society.

Q. Are you the author of any books or publications?

A. I am the author of several articles on various topics concerned with social relations between teachers and pupils and other aspects of social factors in education. I am also the author of articles concerned with relation of these social factors to teaching—to pupil achievement. I have published articles on the impact of social stratafication on education, one that is in press at the present time to appear in the Journal of Educational Theory. I am also the author of articles concerning social factors in relation to citizenship education, an article to appear in the 1951 yearbook of the National Council of Social Studies, now in press. I have in preparation a book to be published by the American Book company that will be entitled "The Sociology of [fol. 265] Education." I am a joint author of a book now in preparation; it's a monograph which will report research which—committee of which I was chairman conducted on minority groups in Maple County, which is a midwestern community.

Q. Other than what you have stated, have you devoted any special study to the problem of the effect of racial segregation on the individual?

A. Well, the monograph which I last mentioned grows out of a rather extended project still in process on the analysis of minority group relations in midwestern society. I have inaugurated at the present time, designed a study to analyze the dynamics of prejudices among youth.

Mr. Goodell: I didn't get that.

The Witness: The dynamics of prejudices among youth in a midwestern school community.

Q. Now, Dr. Brookover, I am going to ask you a hypothetical question which I would like to have you answer on the basis of your learning. Assume that in the City of Topeka there is maintained a racially segregated school system. Would you say that the negro child who attends the racially segregated school receives the same benefits as he would receive from attending a racial integrated school, if all other factors were equal?

A. No, I would not.

[fol. 266] Q. On what do you base your opinion?

A. Well, I would say, first of all, that I would want to emphasize the nature of the educational process in this respect: Education is a process of teaching youth to behave in those ways that society thinks is essential. In our society it has long been held that this is a necessary function, to prepare democratic citizens. Now, the child acquires these essential behavior patterns in association with other people. In other words, they are not fixed; they are not inherent in the behavior of the child, but they are acquired in a social situation. Now, in order to acquire the types of behavior that any society may expect and to learn how to behave in various situations, the child must be provided an opportunity to interact with and understand what kinds of behavior are desired, expected, in all kinds of situations. This is achieved only if the child has presented to him clearly defined models.

Q. What do you mean by models, Professor?

A. Examples, illustrations of behavior; persons behaving in the ways that are—that the child is expected to behave and also consistent behavior of this sort. In other words, of an example, one kind of a model, and another time he is expected to behave if at one time he is presented one kind of an example, one kind of model, and another time he is [fol. 267] presented another kind of a model, and there is a constant confusion. Now that, I think, leads us immediately to the situation with regard to segregated schools. In American society we consistently present to the child a model of democratic equality of opportunity. We teach him the principles of equality; we teach him what kind of ideals we have in American society and set this model of behavior before him and expect him to internalize, to take on, this model, to believe it, to understand it. At the same time, in a segregated school situation he is presented a contradictory or inharmonious model. He is presented a school situation in which it is obvious that he is a subordinate, inferior kind of a citizen. He is not presented a model of equality and equal opportunity and basis of operating in terms of his own individual rights and privileges. Now, this conflict of models always creates confusion, insecurity, and difficulty for the child who can not internalize a clearly defined and clearly accepted definition of his role, so he is faced with situations which he doesn't—he has two or three, at least two in this situation, definitions of how he is expected to behave. This frustration that results may result in a delinquent behavior or otherwise criminal or socially abnormal behavior. Now the negro child is constantly presented with this dual definition of his role as a citizen and the segregated schools perpet- [fol. 268] uates this conflict in expectancies, condemns the negro child to an ineffective role as a citizen and member of society.

BLEED THROUGH

Q. Dr. Brookover, this opinion and the reasons you have just given, are they supported by scientific authority?

A. Yes, there is extensive work been done by psychologists, social psychologists, on the whole theory of role-taking and the question of eternization of patterns of expectancy, such people as George Herbert Meade, Charles Horton Cooley and numerous other people have done extensive work, extensive research in the processes of personality development and learning a situation through social interaction.

Mr. Greenberg: That is all.

Cross-examination.

By Mr. Goodell:

Q. Doctor, I will just ask you one question: Have you ever heard of these people, all negroes: Mary McLeod Bethune of Sumter, South Carolina, who is president of the college there, Bethune-Cookman College, Daytona Beach, Florida.

A. I have heard of someone by the name of Bethune. I am not sure that I know.

Q. Richard Wright, Greenwood, Mississippi and Jackson, Mississippi, author of Native Son, negro.

A. I have.

[fol. 269] Q. Charles Johnson of Bristol, Virginia.

A. Charles Johnson, that I know.

Q. Sociologist and president of Fisk University.

A. I think that is in Tennessee.

Q. Perhaps so. Walter White, of Atlanta, Georgia, Executive Secretary of National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

A. I have heard of him; don't know him.

Q. George Washington Carver, Neosho, Missouri, residence.

A. I have heard of him.

Q. Langston Hughes, poet and author; I believe from Kansas.

A. I have heard of him; don't know him.

Q. W. E. B. DuBois who was an author, I believe connected with Fisk University at Nashville.

A. I know a DuBois who is an anthropologist. I don't know if this is the one.

Q. Mordecai Johnson, Paris, Tennessee, president of Howard University, Washington, D. C., negro university.

A. I know the name; I don't know him at all.

Q. William Grant Still, a composer of Little Rock, Arkansas.

A. Don't know him.

Q. Negro. A. Philip Randolph, Florida, president of the Sleeping—strike that. Charles Wesley of Baltimore, Maryland, president of the university in Ohio; I don't have the town.

[fol. 270] A. I don't know him.

Q. Frederick Patterson, president of Tuskegee Institute, Washington, D. C.

A. I don't know him.

Q. Some of these men you know. Assuming they were all educated—got their preliminary education in segregated schools, a large part of them in the south, would you—did you consider that in arriving at your opinion here?

A. Certainly did. The fact that occasionally a person is able to overcome, through various readjustments and other experiences, the conflict of roles, the conflict of models, does not disturb the generalization which I make, in the least. Certainly there are individual cases which either through psychotherapy or other experiences, the individual is able to overcome such difficulties. But this is not the general case at all.

Q. Well, there are many illustrations of emotional stress and strain among the white children who go to school and don't get—get sort of left out, don't make the football team or the basketball team or don't get invited to the parties, isn't that right?

A. Sure, there are differences in ability to adjust and there are emotional disturbances. The differences which you cite are not enforced differences. They are not inevitable in terms of the situation in which they come—in which [fol. 271] they operate. The child is not by fiat or legalization required to have presented to him this conflict.

Q. That is your opinion about what the law ought to be, in other words, is that it?

A. I would say on the basis of my testimony that the segregation of schools presents a conflicting set of models inevitably.

Q. This opinion you have given here is largely your own personal view based upon your study.

A. No, I wouldn't say it's my own personal view at all. I would say it's the result of a tremendous amount of research and evidence.

Q. I said study.

A. That is accumulated by social psychologists over a period of years and as I have studied and analyzed this research, I would come to this conclusion.

Q. You think you could be wrong?

A. Of course any scientist always presents the possibility or recognizes the possibility that new evidence and new research may modify to some extent the conclusions of a particular time.

Mr. Goodell: That is all.

[fol. 272] LOUISA HOLT, having been first duly sworn, assumed the stand and testified as follows:

Direct examination.

By Mr. Carter:

Q. Mrs. Holt, what is you occupation?

A. I am a social psychologist.

Q. Would you indicate to the Court what your educational background is.

A. I received the Bachelor's Degree, Master's Degree and Ph.D. all from Radcliffe College, which is the feminine adjunct of Harvard University. This was in the field of sociology in the Department of Social Relations there, which includes cultural anthropology, clinical psychology, social psychology, as well as sociology.

Q. Mrs. Holt, would you also describe your various job experiences.

A. Well, I started under an arrangement which gave me a kind of internship in public administration where I worked in the Federal Bureau of Prisons.

Q. Where was this?

A. For six months in Alderson, West Virginia; for about nine months in Washington. Following that, I had a year of graduate study concurrent with work in a settlement house in Boston, South End House, and then was appointed an instructor in sociology at Skidmore College and also [fol. 273] director of a college community center in Saratoga Springs. I was then returned to Radcliffe College where I was appointed a teaching fellow and tutor in sociology. Concurrently with that, I held a Sigmund Freud Memorial Fellowship at the Boston Psychoanalytic Institute in 1944 and 1945. Following these other jobs, I participated in some research work for the Family Society of Boston in connection with their vocational counseling service. I was then an educational counselor for the National Institute of Public Affairs in Washington. From 1947 to 1949 I held a part-time appointment in the Menninger Foundation School of Psychiatry and for part of that time in their school of clinical psychology affiliated with the University of Kansas.

BLEED THROUGH

Q. That is located in this city.

A. What's that?

A. Is that in Topeka?

A. Yes. In the interim, there was a post-doctorate research fellowship of the National Institute of Mental Health. This past year I have been on the faculty of the University of Kansas in the Psychology Department, teaching courses in social psychology and personality and some of their inter-relations. At the same time I also prepared a long paper for a United States Public Health Service project in connection with the Mid-Century Whitehouse Conference [fol. 274] on Children and Youth dealing with the problems, the methodology of evaluating mental health programs.

Q. What is your major field of interests, Mrs. Holt?

A. It's probably clear that I am interested in the relations between social process and social conditions and personality functioning behavior.

Q. Are you a member of any professional societies?

A. The American Sociological Society, the Society for Applied Anthropology, Society for the Psychological Study of Social Issues, the American Society for Group Psychotherapy and Psychodrama, and I am an associate member of the Topeka Psychoanalytic Society.

Q. Mrs. Holt, are you at all familiar with the school system in Topeka?

A. Yes; I have one child who entered that system this last year and another who enters next September.

Q. You are then aware of the fact that the schools are operated on a segregated basis.

A. I am.

Q. Based upon your experience and your knowledge, taking the segregated factor alone in the school system in Topeka, in your opinion does enforced legal separation have any adverse effect upon the personality development of the negro child?

[fol. 275] A. The fact that it is enforced, that it is legal, I think, has more importance than the mere fact of segregation by itself does because this gives legal and official sanction to a policy which inevitably is interpreted both by white people and by negroes as denoting the inferiority of the negro group. Were it not for the sense that one group is inferior to the other, there would be no basis, and I am not granting that this is a rational basis, for such segregation.

Q. Well, does this interference have any effect, in your opinion, on the learning process?

A. A sense of inferiority must always affect one's motivation for learning since it affects the feeling one has of one's self as a person, as a personality or a self or an ego identity, as Eric Erickson has recently expressed it. That sense of ego identity is built up on the basis of attitudes that are expressed toward a person by others who are important. First the parents and then teachers, other people in the community, whether they are older or one's own peers. It is other peoples reactions to one's self which most basically affects the conception of one's self that one has. If these attitudes that are reflected back and then internalized or projected, are unfavorable ones, then one develops a sense of one's self as an inferior being. That may not be deleterious necessarily from the standpoint of [fol. 276] educational motivation. I believe in some cases it can lead to stronger motivation to achieve well in academic pursuits, to strive to disprove to the world that one is inferior since the world feels that one is inferior. In other cases, of course, the reaction may be the opposite and apathetic acceptance, fatalistic submission to the feeling others have expressed that one is inferior and therefore any efforts to prove otherwise would be doomed to failure.

Q. Now these difficulties that you have described, whether they give a feeling of inferiority which you were motivated to attempt to disprove to the world by doing more or whether they give you a feeling of inferiority and therefore cause you to do less, would you say that the difficulties which segregation causes in the public school system interfere with a well—development of a well-rounded personality?

A. I think the maximum or maximal development of any personality can only be based on the potentialities which that individual himself possesses. Of course they are affected for good or ill by the attitudes, opinions, feelings, which are expressed by others and which may be fossilized into laws. On the other hand, these can be overcome in exceptional cases. The instances I cited of those whose motivation to succeed in academic competition is heightened [fol. 277] may very well not be fulfilling their own most basic, most appropriate potentialities but seeking, rather, to tilt against windmills, to disprove something which there was no valid reason, in my opinion, to think was so anyhow, namely, the feeling of their inferiority. So even when educational success is achieved that still may not denote the most self-realization of the person. I feel, if I may add another word, I feel that when segregation exists, it's not something—although it may seem to be such—that is directed against people for what they are. It is directed against them on the basis of who their parents are, since that is the definition which, according to sociologists and social psychologists analysis of the matter, that is used in determining who shall go to a segregated school, a negro school or a white school; it is not simply skin color. In the case of Walter White, for example, and sociologist Allison Davis, his brother, John Davis, who are negroes, their skin color is lighter than mine; of course, I have been out in the sun—the definition does depend upon who a person's parents were. That appears also if a dark-skinned person had parents who were high potentates in India he is not defined as a negro; therefore he is not required to use segregated facilities. It is not the skin color; it is who the parents were, and my understanding and various sociolo- [fol. 278] gists and psychologists analysis of the American tradition, religious tradition as well as set of values and ethos, determining much of our most valued and significant behavior, hinges upon a belief in treating people upon their own merits and we are inclined to oppose a view which states that we should respect people or reject them on the basis of who their parents were.

Q. Now, Mrs. Holt, you are aware of the fact that segregation is practiced in Topeka only for the first six grades. Thereafter, the child goes to high school and junior high school apparently without regard to race or color. You have described difficulties and interferences with the personality development which occurs by virtue of segregation at the first six grades. Is the integration of the child at the junior high school level, does that correct these difficulties which you have just spoken of, in your opinion?

A. I think it's a theory that would be accepted by virtually all students of personality development that the earlier a significant event occurs in the life of an individual the more lasting, the more far-reaching and deeper the effects of that incident, that trauma, will be; the more—the earlier an event occurs, the more difficult it is later on to eradicate those effects.

[fol. 279] Q. Your opinion would be that it would be more difficult to eradicate those effects at the junior high school level, is that it; merely because you integrate them at the junior high school level——

A. Well, once a trauma has occurred, and I do believe that attending a segregated school, perhaps after the preschool years of free play with others of different skin color, is a trauma to the negro child; that occurs early. There is also evidence emerging from a study now going on at Harvard University that the later achievement of individuals in their adult occupational careers can be predicted at the first grade. If that is true, it means that the important effects of schooling in relation to later achievement are set down at that early age, and I therefore don't think that simply removing segregation at a somewhat later grade could possibly undue those effects.

Cross-examination:

By Mr. Goodell:

Q. You mean, Mrs. Holt, there is a serious study being made now to project in the future whether a child in the first grade is going to be a flop or a success?

A. I do.

Q. You have confidence in that, do you?

A. That study is being directed by Professor Tawkett [fol. 280] Parsons, the head of the Department of Social Relations.

Q. You have a good deal of confidence in that?

A. I certainly do.

Q. You made a comment in your testimony I would like to call your attention to again; this segregation in some cases would spur, act as a whiplash, on the child to spur him on and make him achieve, and that would be a bad thing.

BLEED THROUGH

A. Yes.

Q. You mean it's a bad thing, for example, for a poor boy, because he is poor, the whiplash of poverty makes him work harder to rise higher; that is a bad thing?

A. I mean that that can be at the expense of healthy personality development, self-actualization, self-realization of the most basic fundamental and appropriate kind for that person, and we have plenty of evidence of people who burn themselves out with various emotional or perhaps psychosomatic diseases in whose cases that can be attributed to this overweening striving for competitive success to overcome feelings of inferiority.

Q. Mrs. Holt, more or less educational process has in it competitive features, that is, the children are given tests and examinations and gradecards and the ones that don't make good grades, they get poor grades; at least the teacher gives them their merit grade. You don't believe [fol. 281] in that, do you?

A. I believe in the children being appraised on the basis of their own objective achievement.

Q. You don't believe, then, in any sort of competition in the public school system, do you?

A. I believe competition has its values.

Q. Do you believe in that in the way it's carried on and have competitive examinations and gradecarding and things of that kind?

A. I don't know how else one can operate a society in which individuals are judged primarily on their own merits rather than through connections of who their parents were or who they know which are the alternatives to that system.

Q. Progressive education, that is one of the elements that they believe which has been set up in California and other areas, to abolish all grading, abolish all examinations, let every child go to school and never have to worry about what his grades are; never know what they are, isn't that right?

A. I think a child needs some definiteness in the expectations which the authorities over him, the teachers, have in order to stimulate him to his own maximal productiveness. I think also competition with his peers, if not carried to excessive limits, if not if not undue emphasis is placed on it, can also have very beneficial effects.

[fol. 282] Q. These are your personal views you have been giving here largely.

A. They are based on a fair amount of acquaintance with scientific work in this field.

Mr. Goodell: That is all.

If the Court please, at the outset the Court mentioned—I don't care to be objecting about it, but the Court, I thought, suggested a limit on this line of testimony.

Judge Mellott: That is about nine now that we have had on this phase. How many more are there?

Mr. Greenberg: Pardon me, sir, I didn't hear you.

Judge Mellott: You have had several now of the so-called expert testimony; how many will there be?

Mr. Greenberg: We have three or four more, Your Honor, and they are all different.

Judge Huxman: Well, now, we are not disposed to be critical, but it's my opinion from having listened to this testimony, the last four witnesses—that it's all cumulative. I can see no difference, substantial difference, between any of the testimony of the last three or four witnesses. It's fifteen minutes until adjournment time. We are going to have to adjourn this evening at 4:30 on account of a com-[fol. 283] mitment I have. We can, perhaps, finish one more witness in that time. Then I suggest that you gentlemen tonight really appraise your witnesses and appraise this evidence, see whether my statement is warranted that this evidence we are now receiving is all substantially the same and, unless there is more difference in the testimony that you have, we might well have the qualifications of the remaining witnesses read into the record and have a stipulation that their testimony as to the effect of segregation itself upon the mental attitude upon the outlook and life of the student is substantially as testified to by these witnesses. I am just simply suggesting that, saying not that we will enforce that rule in the morning, but it was understood that about five witnesses would be allowed, and then we would examine the subject, and we are reaching that point, so suppose you call your next witness; that will take us to adjournment time.

JOHN J. KANE, having been first duly sworn, assumed the stand and testified as follows:

Direct examination.

By Mr. Greenberg:

Q. What is your full name?

A. John J. Kane.

[fol. 284] Q. What is your occupation?

A. I am an instructor in Sociology at the University of Notre Dame.

Q. What is your educational background?

A. I have a Bachelor of Arts Degree from St. Joseph's College, a Master of Arts Degree in sociology from Temple University, a Doctor of Philosophy Degree in Sociology from the University of Pennsylvania.

Q. What positions have you held?

A. I was an instructor in sociology at St. Joseph's College about two and a half or three years. I have been instructor in Sociology at the University of Notre Dame for three years.

Q. Have you devoted yourself for any of your professional attention to the field of the impact of racial segregation on the individual?

A. I have done two studies in the general field of prejudices, racial—my major interest in the graduate school was in the field of race relations and ethnic relations.

Q. Mr. Kane, on the basis of your educational experience and your studies, I want you to answer the following hypothetical question: Assume that in the City of Topeka there is maintained a racially segregated school system and that a negro child is compelled to attend a racially segregated school because of his race alone; that if this [fol. 285] system did not exist, he would attend a racially integrated school, would you say that if all other factors are equal, that he obtains the same educational opportunities at the former school as at the latter?

A. No, I would not.

Q. Now, would you give us the basis for your opinion, Mr. Kane.

A. I would begin with two points: The first one is that the school, with the exception of the home, is the institution that makes the greatest impact on American youth. You see, the school gets the child early in life, keeps him for a number of years, so that day after day, year after year it is transferring attitudes for him. Now, we have some scientific evidence about the effectiveness of the accumulation of materials in this area. For instance, Professor Thurston's work on changing attitudes through motion pictures shows that when one picture was shown to a group of youngsters it had relatively little influence in changing attitudes; two had a little more, but if he worked in series of three, he discovered cumulative evidence was very powerful in changing attitudes. What I am mentioning this for is the fact that the influence of the segregated school, when a negro child day after day, year after year, does have this cumulative effect. Secondly, I would like to point out that one of the things children get out of education besides cer-[fol. 286] tain manual skills, spelling, arithmetic and science, is above all, the formation of attitudes. This is what lasts; this is what continues after the school years, and therefore the attitude they get in the particular schools is of great significance. Now, in a school system in which racial segregation is practiced, you have a day after day accumulation of attitudes that the negro child is inferior because segregation is differentiation and distinction. It means, as Professor Newcomb has pointed out, that one group denies to another group, status, privilege and power and so it is borne in upon a negro boy and girl that they are being differentiated not merely because of skin color or physical characteristics, but because there is something inately inferior or subordinate about them and so most of them begin to learn that certain avenues of vertical mobility are closed to them.

Q. What do you mean by vertical mobility?

BLEED THROUGH

A. I mean the opportunity of advancing in the world, moving ahead, having a better job than your father had, more social position, and I would point out to you that this concept is fundamental to the American system of values. This is one of the things that we Americans believe in very intensively, and it is something which is denied to negro children. Furthermore, the philosophy of racial segrega- [fol. 287] gation is supported by rationalizations on the racial myth of inferiority for which we have no adequate scientific evidence. Secondly, segregation cuts down on the communication among people. It erects a barrier. Now, certain barriers will exist whether you have a segregation enforced by law or not, but here's a case where barriers are created and upheld by law. The total effect is to make most of your negro children feel inferior, and I would like to refer to a study that was made by Preston with regard to projected scores on tests. A number of white boys were asked to put down the score they expected to get on a certain test and, when they put down the score, they were told that negro youths had made a higher score. The white boys were allowed to change, and they immediately changed their scores above the negro score. Negro youths were told they were about to take a test and were asked to put down the expected score and, when they put it down, they were told this was higher than the white boys made, and they were asked if they wanted to change it, and they lowered their scores below that of the white group. This is indicative of the expectation of behavior which is engendered in a segregated school among most of your colored students.

Q. Dr. Kane, you mentioned a study that you made.

A. Well——

[fol. 288] Q. —in this field. Could you tell us whether or not that study supports the conclusion which you just stated and describe the study.

A. I studied groups of negro boys, gangs, in West Philadelphia. I think it could be used.

Q. Will you describe what you did in this study.

A. We discovered in this particular area there was a system of social stratafication among negroes. The area was roughly split into two sections, one in which the negroes called the "Tops" and the other which they called the "Bottoms." In the "Tops" you had a high degree of homeownership, negro males there, the fathers had better occupations, larger income and a fairly stable family. The "Bottoms" area you never had any area in which as many as 6% of the negroes owned their homes. You had a relatively unstable family; for the most part they were employed in menial jobs. Now you would think that the "Bottoms" area, as a group, represented the lowest level of negro society, but these negroes themselves made a distinction, and they would point out that there was still a lower group than this, and that was the negro from the south and, if you asked them, they said because of segregated education. Now, I want to point out, whether or not that was true, is quite beside the point because, as W. I. Thomas indicated long ago, if men define situations as [fol. 289] real, they are real in their consequences and this is the attitude the negro group itself held, and, of course, this is the way we form attitudes about ourselves; not only what we think, but what we know or believe other people think about us. So, here again, you have an indication of the inferiority that was engendered because of the segregated school system amongst the immigrants from the south.

Mr. Greenberg: That is all.

By Mr. Goodell:

Q. Professor, don't you believe a home which has the child, say the first five years without any—where the school doesn't have him at all, in any case whether he is negro or white, don't you think the child has a great deal to do with attitudes, it's race and towards another race and acceptance, and so forth.

A. You are perfectly correct. As a matter of fact, the home is much more important than the school, if it's an adequate home. Now, I should like to point out, if I may——

Q. That answers my question.

BLEED THROUGH

Judge Huxman: You may go ahead and give your explanation. This is an expert witness.

The Witness: I should like to point out that when the home facilities are inadequate, as they are in so many [fol. 290] cases of your poor negro family, then the school becomes increasingly important and, in those cases probably, more important than the home since it is exercising little influence.

Mr. Goodell: I have no further questions.

Judge Huxman: It is now five minutes of adjournment time, and we perhaps could not finish another witness, and I just have an appointment I must keep. So we will suspend at this time.

The court will be in recess until tomorrow morning promptly at 9:30.

(The court then, at 4:25 o'clock p. m., adjourned until 9:30 o'clock a. m., the following day, Tuesday, June 26, 1951.)

[fol. 291] Tuesday, June 26, 1951

(Pursuant to adjournment as aforesaid, the court met, present and presiding as before, and the following proceedings were had:)

Judge Huxman: You may proceed, gentlemen.

Let me inquire of the attorney for plaintiff, how many more of these expert witnesses do you have?

Mr. Carter: Your Honor, we at the present time—we only have one more expert witness to put on.

Judge Huxman: Just one more expert witness.

Do you have any testimony after that or will that conclude your case?

Mr. Carter: We have subpoenaed a number of witnesses, Your Honor, and we are contemplating calling only one other witness to establish one point.

Judge Huxman: All right, you may put on this other witness, expert witness.

BETTIE BELK, having been first duly sworn, assumed the stand and testified as follows:

Direct examination.

By Mr. Carter:

Q. Miss Belk, what is your occupation?

A. At the present time I am on the staff of the Workshop in Human Relations at the University of Kansas City, Missouri.

[fol. 292] Q. What is your educational background?

A. I have my Bachelor's Degree from State Teachers College in Worcester, Massachusetts, my Master's Degree from Clark University in Worcester, Massachusetts, and, at the present time, I am working on my Ph.D. in Human Development at the University of Chicago.

Q. Miss Belk, what other than your present employment at the University of Kansas City—what other job experience have you had?

A. I have taught junior and senior high school in Indiana for two years; for ten years I was employed by the Y. W. C. A., first as director of the teen age program in Trenton, New Jersey, and for five years as a member of the national staff as a consultant on the teen age program. In that capacity I did work in the midwest; Kansas was one of the twelve states in the area that I served, and I have worked with the local organization here on their problems of teen age program. At the university I have been employed as a research assistant in the study of developmental tasks of adolescents and, during the past year, I have been on the staff of the Center for Inter-Group Education.

Q. Have you published any books or articles on the problems of adolescents?

A. Yes, for the Y. W. C. A. I published several articles on teen age problems and a pamphlet designed for train[fol. 293] ing adult leaders to work with teen agers.

Q. Do you belong to any professional societies?

A. Yes. I am a member of the National Association of Group Workers.

Q. What is your field of major interests?

BLEED THROUGH

A. Well, my recent experience has been in training adults to work with groups, and I am particularly interested in this aspect of human development. My work at the present time is in the training of adult leadership for this kind of job.

Q. That is the training of an adult—of adults to work with adolescents and so forth?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, assume, Miss Belk, that the City of Topeka has organized its public school system so that a child enters the first grade at approximately the age of six; goes through the elementary schools, six grades; he would be entering a junior high school at approximately the age of twelve. Assume that for the first six grades the schools in Topeka are maintained on a segregated basis. Thereafter, the junior high schools and high schools, the schools are integrated. Based upon your experience and your knowledge, would you give an opinion as to whether or not it would be harmful—it would have any adverse effect on the child at that stage of his development to move from a segregated educational [fol. 294] pattern into an integrated pattern?

A. I would say that by bringing children together for the first time at this age, the Board of Education is working a real hardship on both the negro and white children, and I would like to explain why, if I may.

Q. Please do so.

A. I think that it is a well established fact that the years just preceding age 12, the years 10 to 12, roughly, for girls and 11 to 13 for boys, are the years during which the important physical and physiological changes take place. The child at age 12 is trying to integrate two to five inches of standing height that he had acquired very rapidly. He is also trying to integrate very important physiological changes. In our society, girls reach puberty at about twelve and a half and boys at about thirteen and a half, and they are adjusting to really a new kind of body for them because of the changes which have taken place. There are social changes that take place also at this age; changes take place within the school system itself. Up until this point the child has been accustomed to a school situation in which he has related to one adult. Now he moves into what we call a departmentalized pattern. He has several teachers; he moves from one classroom to another. In other words, he has a pattern of relationship with many important adults in the school system. Also, at this age the child moves [fol. 295] from a peer society which has been largely made up of members of the same sex, into a heterosexual society. The seventh grade is a crucial one for girls, particularly, because they become interested in boys before boys become interested in them, and this is a very difficult time for them to live through. All in all, these are the years when children are making some of their most important life adjustments, and I would say that having been brought up in a separate system where they can only learn that negroes and white are different, they must at this age then make an adjustment to living with someone that they have learned is different, and I think that this puts an additional adjustment on them at an age when it is very difficult for them to make it.

Cross-examination.

By Mr. Goodell:

Q. Is it Miss or Mrs. Belk?

A. It's Miss Belk.

Q. Are you familiar with the City of Topeka and the customs and usages with respect to inter-racial matters?

A. I have visited the City of Topeka as a consultant for the Y. W. C. A., yes.

Q. Do you realize that for half a century, to some degree, there has been segregation practiced in the business world and in the social strata of this community?

A. I believe that I have heard that there is segregation in [fol. 296] in the community, yes.

Q. Without regard to the merits, if that is a fact, assuming—strike that—that there is segregation practiced in the ordinary workday life of the community in the business world and in the social strata as of our two races here, negro and the white, and assuming further for the purpose of this question that there were no segregation in the first six grades of our public school system, and the negro children were absorbed in the present existing white schools, where they were outnumbered twenty-five to fifty to one and, in some cases, more than that, would you reform your opinion any, taking that into account?

BLEED THROUGH

A. No, I would not.

Q. Do you know what the natural tendencies are in a practical world? Would it be customary, where children come from homes—living in a community where segregation is practiced other than in the schools, for those same white children to carry on that same custom and usage in their relations with the race—with the opposite race—the negro.

A. I don't understand your question.

Q. Well, assuming that segregation, as I have just stated, as practiced in this community in Topeka, in the city, outside of the school, and that is a fact, children coming from homes in this community, isn't it very natural that they [fol. 297] would simply carry on that custom and usage in their relations with other negro students of the opposite race?

A. Well, I think our recent studies have shown that children, adolescents particularly, take most of their social pattern from their peers rather than their parents; in fact, it's one of the real problems in our American society today that this is true.

Q. Who are the children, what do you mean by that, that the negro children they would look upon as their peers and therefore they would follow them; what do you mean?

A. I mean that all adolescent children take most of their social patterns from people their own age; they tend to see each other as authorities. It's an age at which they break away completely from parental authority, in fact to the extent that it becomes a difficult problem in home-life, so it is not always the patterns of the parents that they are repeating; in fact, during this time they are forming their own values.

Q. I don't know as I understand it. You consider another child, that a child will look upon another white child as his peer, is that what you are getting at?

A. Yes.

Q. What is there about another child of the same age that would make him a peer as to another child?

A. This is one of the phenomena of development. The child must, in his growing up process, ultimately break [fol. 298] away from the home. Now adolescents in our society are treated at one moment as though they were children and the parents are very authoritarian with them and at another moment they are expected to behave like adults and, consequently, most of them are in some state of confusion as to what their status really is. But they are moving always toward adulthood, toward establishing their own values and, for this reason, they take more of their pattern—you can see it even in their dress. I don't know if you have any adolescent children of your own, but if you do you know they dress alike, they act alike, they talk alike. They get their values largely from each other at this age.

Q. Assuming for the purpose of this question, though, that segregation was abolished and the negro child was absorbed in the white school system and, for illustration, he was outnumbered in the particular school system on the average of thirty to one or twenty to one or any figure of that proportion; taking into account the natural factors of every-day life and the practicabilities of the situation, wouldn't that result in and of itself of him being a very small minority group and being left out of activities and the run of things, the negro child.

A. I do not think that that is necessarily true. In fact, in my own experience I have seen it not to be true.

[fol. 299] Q. Well, isn't that true within the white structure, that some children run things and others tag along; some are leaders and others aren't?

A. This is an individual matter. It is quite true.

Q. And to that extent where you have children that do run things, elected class officers and in all activities, make the teams and so forth, and in their own group, and in the other children that doesn't—aren't given recognition in that sense, that child—this philosophy of yours, this theory of yours, is made to feel second-class and left out of things, isn't that right, of his own group.

A. Of his own group, yes, and most of us who work in inter-group relations nowadays see this as a total thing. There is no longer any stress on negro-white relations; it's on inter-group relations.

Q. I mean without regard to the racial factor, you have that situation in any organized society, don't you; some people get along better than others, run things, are leaders; others tagging along and are not leaders.

A. This is true and our problem is to work so that everybody has a niche into which he fits.

Q. How would you eliminate that aspect of life in a school system where some children are not the leaders and don't run the show and are sort of left out, so they don't have an inferiority feeling that they are second-[fol. 300] class? How would you get rid of that?

A. As a matter of fact we have been doing some work on that at the center for inter-group education. Our work deals with schools. Well, for example, in one school children said you are separated here according to whether or not you belong to the cashmere sweater set, so this became the problem that we worked on. The way that we usually do it is sitting down with young people themselves and talking about why people do exclude other people and why this is important to them and what are the values in learning to live with people who are different from you and being able to accept them.

Q. Well, without regard to your—adoption of your theories and your opinion here in the school system, you are still going to have that problem considering the practicalities of the situation.

A. The problem of rejection and acceptance is one that will be with all of us all through life.

Q. Surely. Isn't it awfully difficult for you to have the experience of a negro child so that you could expertly say what he feels, a first grader and a third grader, and so forth, how he feels about anything.

A. Is it difficult for me?

Q. Certainly, to put your mind—I mean to—for you to assume the feelings of a negro child that is in these elemen-[fol. 301] tary grades? How do you do that?

A. It is difficult for me really to understand the experiences of anyone else, but this is part of my job.

Q. Well, I grant all that, but how do you do it; how can you tell what I feel and react and my reactions, and so forth, to a set of facts or my social relations.

A. How do I actually do it?

Q. How do you tell it, yes.

A. Well, I try to put myself in the other person's place.

Q. Well, I know that, but I mean is it like a mathematical problem that we have got in algebra so that you can add it up and prove it.

A. We do have techniques for doing this sort of thing and the technique is known as role-playing, and I would be glad to describe it to you.

Q. If some of your assumptions are wrong, then your whole conclusions you reach are wrong too, aren't they; isn't that right? That's all.

A. Well——

(Witness excused.)

Mr. Carter: We were going to call our next witness, Mrs. Dorothy Crawford, but I don't believe she is here, and so we will rest.

Judge Huxman: You will rest.

Mr. Carter: Yes, sir.

[fol. 302] Judge Huxman: Plaintiff rests.

Mr. Goodell: If the Court please, I would like to be given about ten minutes. There were some members of the school system I couldn't reach last night and, because you started at 9:30, I couldn't get hold of them in time. I won't take over ten minutes.

Judge Huxman: That was too early for the school members to be out?

Mr. Goodell: No, I couldn't get in touch with them.

Judge Huxman: You want a ten-minute recess?

Mr. Goodell: If it isn't imposing, yes.

Judge Huxman: Court will be in recess.

(The court then, at 9:45 o'clock a. m., stood at recess until 9:55 o'clock a. m., at which time the following proceedings were had:)

Mr. Goodell: Does the Court want all my witnesses sworn at one time?

BLEED THROUGH

Judge Huxman: We will follow the same procedure.

Mr. John Scott: If the Court please, we have a witness that just arrived, and we would like to put her on; just a short witness.

Judge Huxman: All right.

Mr. John Scott: And we would also like to invoke Rule [fol. 303] 43(b), that is, on hostile witnesses. This witness will testify pertaining to transportation, and she also has a financial interest in it and, therefore, we would like to invoke that rule.

Mr. Goodell: Who is the witness?

Mr. John Scott: Mrs. Dorothy Crawford.

Judge Huxman: The hostile witness rule is rather a flexible rule, and it depends upon whether the witness shows any hostility, so suppose you proceed in the regular way of examination, and we will then be guided by what follows.

Mr. John Scott: All right.

Dorothy Crawford, having been first duly sworn, assumed the stand and testified as follows:

Direct Examination.

By Mr. John Scott:

Q. State your name to the Court, please.

A. Mrs. Dorothy Crawford.

Q. Where do you live?

A. 835 Clay.

Q. Here in the City of Topeka?

A. Topeka.

Q. Defendants' Exhibit "B"(1) that has been admitted into evidence indicates that you are engaged in the pro- [fol. 304] fession of teaching, is that correct?

A. That's right.

Q. And you also teach at Buchanan School.

A. That's right.

Q. And you also teach the first and part of the second grade, is that right?

A. That's right.

Q. And also Defendants' Exhibit "D" states that you receive $272.19 for transportation, is that correct?

A. I don't remember the exact amount.

Q. I want you to explain to the Court, if anybody, that you transport, what persons and of what grades that you transport.

Mr. Goodell: We object to that as incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial; don't see the purpose of it.

Judge Hill: What is the purpose of it?

Mr. John Scott: The purpose of this testimony is to show that she transports kindergarten children and she dismisses her grade for the purpose of transporting children, and those children are sent to another classroom during the time that she is conveying these children.

Judge Huxman: You may answer.

(The last preceding question was here read by the re-[fol. 305] porter.)

By Mr. John Scott:

Q. —if any.

A. I do transport kindergarten children after dismissing the first grade at 11:30 and the second grade at 11:45.

Q. Now, when you dismiss your class at 11:30, where does—where do the second-grade children go?

A. I stay in the building and teach the second-grade children until 11:45. I do not dismiss the second grade until 11:45.

Q. Now, Mrs. Crawford, you say you transport the children at 11:30, is that correct?

A. No, I did not say that. I said that I transport the children after dismissing the first grade at 11:30 and the second grade at 11:45. I do not leave the building until after I dismiss the second grade at 11:45.

Q. Isn't it a matter of fact that you take the kindergarten children home at 11:30, and you send the second-grade class into another classroom?

A. No, I do not.

Q. During the time that you have undertaken these duties of transporting the kindergarten children, haven't you done that?

BLEED THROUGH

A. I have not.

Judge Mellott: Didn't your witness testify it was 11:45 that this transportation began?

[fol. 306] Mr. John Scott: No, 11:30.

Judge Mellott: I don't agree.

Mr. John Scott: I think the testimony yesterday indicated it was 11:30.

Judge Mellott: No, the testimony yesterday was as she has given, after the dismissal of the second class at 11:45 that she transported the children.

Mr. John Scott: I don't think the record shows that, Your Honor.

Judge Mellott: I think it does, but you may proceed.

By Mr. John Scott:

Q. Well, during the year of 1950 and '51 can you state to the Court the approximate number of children that you transported, that is, each day.

A. The number varied according to the attendance, daily attendance, and also according to the transfer of children from one district to another and according to some children going out of town and some coming in town and also some parents on some days elected to come for their children; so it's hard to tell the exact number each day.

Q. Well, use your best judgment, Mrs. Crawford.

Judge Huxman: What's the purpose of this? What are you trying——

Mr. John Scott: It's to ascertain the number of children she transports daily, and I am going to ask her the type [fol. 307] of vehicle she is driving, Your Honor.

Mr. Goodell: If the Court please, this isn't an accounting procedure. Do they claim she's overpaid or what is it?

Mr. John Scott: We are not claiming anything such.

Judge Huxman: You are trying to establish the buses are overcrowded, is that it?

Mr. John Scott: Trying to establish the number of children she's transporting daily and the type of vehicle.

Judge Huxman: What is the purpose of that when you establish it?

Mr. John Scott: The fact that these children are transported under crowded conditions.

Judge Huxman: Well——

By Mr. John Scott:

Q. What type of vehicle do you drive, Mrs. Crawford?
A. I drive a Ford two-door.
Q. What model?
A. A two-door.
Q. Well, I mean——

Mr. Goodell: Year model he means.

By Mr. John Scott:

Q. Year model.
A. 1938.

[fol. 308] Q. Just give your best judgment the number of children that you take in that car each day; is it six, eight, nine, ten or twelve?

A. Well, I take no more than five at a time. When there are more than five children I make two trips.

Q. You make two trips.
A. Yes.

Q. I see. Do you have any special coverage for liability of these children that you carry?

Mr. Goodell: Now, we submit, if the Court please, we object to that as incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial, has no probative force in this case.

Judge Huxman: The objection will be sustained. It is collateral and can't go to any due process, has no bearing on this matter.

Mr. John Scott: I believe that is all.

Cross-examination.

By Mr. Goodell:

Q. Are you neglecting your teaching job by hauling some kids wholly during the noon hour?
A. I am not.

BLEED THROUGH

Mr. Goodell: That is all.

Judge Huxman: Are you through now? Plaintiff rests?

Mr. Carter: Yes.

[fol. 309] Judge Huxman: You may proceed with the defense.

Clarence G. Grimes, having been first duly sworn, assumed the stand and testified as follows:

Direct examination.

By Mr. Goodell:

Q. State your name for the record and for the Court.

A. Clarence G. Grimes.

Q. You are commonly known around town here as "Cap" Grimes.

A. That's right.

Q. Were you an officer in World War I?

A. I was.

Q. Have you had for many years the contract with the Topeka Board of Education for the transporting of pupils to the negro schools?

A. Thirty-five years.

Q. Are you familiar then with all the details of the actual carrying out of that mission or the transportation of——

A. I am.

Q. There has been some testimony here offered in the plaintiffs' case to the effect that they had to wait long periods of time at scheduled bus stops. State what the facts are about these buses running on schedule, and so forth.

A. I plan my schedule on clock time to reach the corners at a certain time and, if they are waiting much longer [fol. 310] than what they say here, they are there before the bus is supposed to get there.

Judge Hill: I can't hear the witness.

Judge Mellott: It's difficult to hear you, Mr. Grimes; if you will talk a little louder.

By Mr. Goodell:

Q. Repeat that.

A. I say I run my bus on the scheduled time by the clock and, if there is children at the corners that have to wait any length of time, they are there long before the bus should be able to get there. They know what time the bus is supposed to get to the corner.

Q. There is some testimony here in the case given yesterday relating to scheduled stop where a child or parent, perhaps both, testified they had to go seven blocks down here to get to the bus at First and Quincy. Are you familiar with that?

A. Yes, I am.

Q. Is that correct?

A. No.

Q. What are the facts about it?

A. This child lives four blocks and three houses west of First and Kansas Avenue and the bus sets seventy-five feet east of First and Kansas Avenue.

Q. Were you present in court when the testimony was given about the time of the morning that they left in [fol. 311] order to get to the bus stop?

A. I was.

Q. So that would be thirty minutes to go four blocks.

A. That's right.

Q. Do you have, as a practical matter, do you have instances of colored children, negro children, going farther from their home than a scheduled bus stop in order to get to ride longer?

A. I used to have, but I don't have that anymore.

Q. What—do you know the proximity—some of the children have you pick them up—how far away?

A. I think the longest distance is five blocks.

Q. And the closest?

A. The closest distance, some of them are right by their houses.

Q. How far from school?

A. Oh, some of the Washington children are eight or nine blocks from school when I pick them up.

Q. What are some of the closest you pick up and take?

A. From the school?

BLEED THROUGH

Q. From many of the schools, yes.

A. That is about the distance—Sixth and Chandler is the closest.

Q. Yes. Now there was some testimony given yesterday [fol. 312] to the effect by one parent—I don't have his name—lives out here in the east part of town, around Chandler in that neighborhood—he had his child ride on the city bus because he had observed children leaning out the windows and their arms out the windows, and so forth. How are these buses built?

A. According to the state regulations on buses, school buses, you have to have half windows in your buses and my windows let down from the top, not any farther than that distance, and they can't get their heads out.

Q. It's impossible.

Judge Mellott: Indicating what, six inches?

The Witness: About six inches.

By Mr. Goodell:

Q. Now, do you try to maintain some decorum in those buses so that it's orderly and the children——

A. —the principal to put a patrol on each one of these buses.

Q. You mean the principal of the schools have a school patrol on each bus.

A. That's right.

Q. And they ride the buses, do they?

A. They do.

Mr. Goodell: I believe that is all.

Judge Huxman: You may cross-examine.

[fol. 313] Cross-examination.

By Mr. Carter:

Q. Mr. Grimes, how many buses do you operate?

A. Just one.

Q. And to how many schools do you take children?

A. Two.

Q. I show you this exhibit, would you indicate to me what the bus schedule you follow on that exhibit—the exhibit is marked "G"——

Judge Mellott: "G"?

Mr. Carter: "G".

The Witness: I follow the Washington and Monroe schedules.

By Mr. Carter:

Q. Now you have looked at this schedule and this is correct?

A. That is the time the bus arrives at certain places.

Q. I note on this schedule which you have indicated is correct that at 8:29 you unload the rest of the group at the Monroe School; that is, your first load is taken to the Monroe School, and you get there 8:29, is that correct?

A. That varies on account of traffic sometimes; sometimes it's after that and sometimes a little before that.

Q. The schedules—the schedule indicates—I think your testimony indicated that you arrived at a certain time per day and that there was no waiting because of the sched- [fol. 314] ule. Now you tell me that here when it says you are supposed to get to the Monroe School at 8:29 you cannot say that is correct because it varies due to the traffic. Now is this or is this not a correct time schedule for your buses?

A. I didn't say I got to the Monroe School at 8:29.

Q. Your schedule says it does.

A. I know, but that is not my schedule.

Judge Huxman: It seems to me—I don't want to restrict the opportunity to present this evidence—but this goes to a very minor matter. In the first place, there is a schedule and, in the second place, I think I would take judicial knowledge that maybe buses sometimes are a little bit late and sometimes children get there a little ahead of time. I doubt if there ever was a bus that ran exactly on the second. I don't want to restrict you in your cross-examination, but I wouldn't pursue that too far.

Mr. Carter: Well, the only reason that I raised it is that the testimony which has been established, attempted to be established by the defendants, is that the schedule is followed and that the bus arrives on time.

BLEED THROUGH

Judge Huxman: Suppose you established that the schedule varied or the bus wasn't always there on time, do you think that would have a weighty bearing on the question [fol. 315] of whether the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment was thereby violated. It might be an insignificant——

Mr. Carter: I don't believe it would be crucial.

Judge Huxman: Let's not pursue it too far. This case isn't going to turn on whether this schedule is strictly adhered to or whether there is a variance in it.

Mr. Carter: All right, sir, I will follow your suggestion.

Judge Huxman: In the first place, I think the buses are late. I have never seen a bus yet that wasn't late.

By Mr. Carter:

Q. What is the maximum capacity on your buses?

A. My bus has a seating capacity of thirty-six.

Q. And you indicated that there are monitors on the bus.

A. Yes.

Q. Who are they?

A. I don't know them by name. I don't know hardly any of the children by last names; some of the first names, I believe, the older boys and girls of the different schools.

Q. Is this only on your return from school?

A. No, going to and coming.

Q. Going to and coming.

[fol. 316] A. Yes, sir.

Q. Every day there is a different person.

A. No, it isn't a different person; it's the same child.

Q. You don't know who it is.

A. I know who they are by looking at them. I can't tell you their names because I am not familiar with all their names.

Redirect examination.

By Mr. Goodell:

Q. Mr. Grimes, you mentioned that only Monroe and Washington were the only ones you personally transported.

Do you know how the other schools are handled, who transports them?

A. The Topeka Transportation Company.

Q. The city bus system.

A. The city bus system.

Q. They use their own ordinary equipment.

A. That's right.

Q. They contract that with the Board of Education.

A. That's right.

Mr. Goodell: That's all.

Judge Huxman: Step down.

[fol. 317] THELMA MIFFLIN, having been first duly sworn, assumed the stand and testified as follows:

Direct examination.

By Mr. Goodell:

Q. State your name to the Court and for the record.

A. Thelma Mifflin.

Q. What official position do you hold in the city schools?

A. I am the clerk of the Board of Education.

Judge Huxman: I didn't get the answer.

The Witness: I am the clerk of the Board of Education.

By Mr. Goodell:

Q. How long have you been in such administrative capacity?

A. I have been in Topeka in that capacity for nine years; twenty-seven years total in other school systems.

Q. Are the records then that have been furnished the Court here that are exhibits in this case, were they made under your supervision and direction?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. They are true and accurate records?

A. They are.

Q. And reflect correctly the matters which are covered by them?

BLEED THROUGH

A. That's right.

[fol. 318] Q. Did you bring with you this morning at my direction an exhibit or list of the number of colored, negro, students transported?

A. Yes, sir, four copies.

Q. I will hand you what has been marked Defendants' Exhibit "O" and is that a list of the—broken down by schools—of the negro students that are transported in the City of Topeka to the negro schools?

A. That's right.

Q. And it's true and correct?

A. It is.

Mr. Goodell: We offer the same in evidence.

Judge Huxman: What is the exhibit number?

Judge Mellott: "O".

Judge Huxman: Exhibit "O" will be received.

Defendants' Exhibit "O", having been offered and received in evidence, is contained in the case file.

By Mr. Goodell:

Q. Mrs. Mifflin, do you attend all board meetings in your capacity as clerk for the Board of Education?

A. Yes, sir, I do.

Q. You are present then when discussions of policy and administrative policy and the running of the schools comes up for discussion by the board and Dr. McFarland.

[fol. 319] A. Yes, sir.

Q. You are familiar, then, and have been all these years, with that policy.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Are you familiar then with the actual policy with respect to the operation of the entire school system which includes the eighteen elementary schools and the four negro schools?

A. Yes, sir, I am.

Q. State whether or not you know the policy that has been adopted and carried out by the Board of Education with respect to the negro schools concerning the right of a child, if he so elects or his parents, to attend any one of the four negro schools of his own selection; do you know the policy about that?

A. Yes, it is the policy of the board to allow the child to attend the school which he wishes to attend in the colored division.

Q. Do you recall of any instances when that election was made which wasn't acceded to?

A. No.

Q. Are you likewise familiar with the course of study that is prescribed by state law and whether or not it's been adopted and used in the city schools, elementary schools, both negro and white schools.

A. The same course of study is used in all schools.

[fol. 320] Q. That would mean then, of course, the same textbooks.

A. That's right.

Q. There was some testimony given here yesterday by Dr. Speer concerning his examination of books and comparisons that he made from books found in negro schools, comparing the books found in certain of the white schools, that he made such a similar examination. Do you know whether or not, as far as the Board of Education is concerned, there is any distinction or differences in the furnishing of books to the different schools on the basis of their color, whether negro or white schools.

A. There is no distinction made. The number of books isn't—the number of books sent is determined by the number of children in the school.

Q. Well, I mean do you have any policy to send old-style books down to the negro schools and new books to the white schools?

A. No, there is no policy like that. I am sorry that Dr. Speer didn't see the schools when they were in operation. He saw them after they were closed. If a principal had "put his school to bed" as we say correctly, the good books would have been packed in boxes and packed away. The books that are left out on the shelf are books that could be eliminated, really.

Q. Obsolete books.

A. That's right.

[fol. 321] Q. But the modern up-to-date books that are actually used in the operation of the schools, your policy has been as soon as school is out to box them up and put them away.

BLEED THROUGH

A. Put them away very carefully so they won't be dusty when school starts.

Q. Now, Miss Mifflin, state, if you know, whether or not additional books, not furnished by the Board of Education, are sometimes furnished by the Parent Teachers Association made up of parents of children living in the various territories in the city?

A. Yes. P. T. A.'s very frequently have money to spend, and they do buy books for various schools.

Q. Buy it with their own money, not public funds.

A. That's right.

Q. And put it in that particular school where the P. T. A. decides to make that purchase, is that correct?

A. That's right.

Q. And that is no different, whether it's negro or white, is that right?

A. That's right.

Q. The board doesn't spend its money or have any control over that.

A. No.

Q. Other than that dissimilarity wherein the Parent Teachers Association in some territory might buy more—might have more money to spend, is there any dissimilarity [fol. 322] by reference books or books furnished by the board in any of the schools in the elementary system?

A. There is no difference.

Q. Now, I want to direct your attention, Miss Mifflin, to what has been introduced in evidence as Exhibit "A" and which I want—first, I will ask you if all of the territories are named and designated on this Exhibit "A", both white and negro?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Of the entire school system?

A. That's right.

Q. Are school territories also shown on Exhibit "A" which are outside the city limits of Topeka?

A. Yes; the school district is on that map.

Q. In other words, you have some areas shown on Exhibit "A" which are in the City of Topeka for school purposes alone, is that right?

A. That's right.

Q. Does that appear colored in blue?

A. That's right.

Q. I will ask you whether or not in each, if you know, according to the records of the Board of Education, if you have children attending from all of these areas shown in the territory, school territory, or put it another way, from [fol. 323] the blue, what is marked blue.

A. Yes, we do have.

Q. Is any transportation furnished to any of the white children from any part of town?

A. None at all.

Q. Do some of them live as much as thirty blocks away?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Well, in those cases, if they ride a bus, do they ride a city bus?

A. Yes, they would have to furnish their own transportation.

Q. Now, do you furnish a convoy with any of these children, people to go with them to get them across the streets, and so forth.

A. No, sir.

Q. White children.

A. No.

Q. Do you have any control—state, if you know, whether you have any control—I mean by you, the Board of Education, over selection of traffic lights or blinker lights at any territory in the City of Topeka?

A. No; that is the business of the city.

Q. And how—and do you know how they make that decision?

A. I think they——

Judge Huxman: Mr. Goodell, that would have to be hearsay on her part.

[fol. 324] Mr. Goodell: Yes, it would be.

By Mr. Goodell:

Q. Miss Mifflin, Exhibit "E" and "J" that have been introduced in evidence have to do or set out in a portion of the exhibits the facilities of each school in the whole City of Topeka and, particularly, it shows on that exhibit —those exhibits—whether they have a gymnasium or auditorium and, in some cases, where they are combined, is that accurate, true and correct?

BLEED THROUGH

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Those exhibits.

A. That's right.

Q. Do you have some white schools where you have that combination where you turn one room into one, using it——

Judge Huxman: Mr. Goodell, haven't those exhibits been agreed to?

Mr. Goddell: I believe so. I have a note that it wasn't entirely agreed to as to that particular feature.

Judge Huxman: There were only two questions -bout it at all. The exhibits were admitted.

Mr. Goodell: Except it was held up because they claim inaccuracies in the case of one school. I have a note to that effect.

Judge Huxman: You might ask her about that one inaccuracy.

By Mr. Goodell:

Q. I believe Dr. Speer was the witness who testified [fol. 325] pertaining to four schools which I will direct your attention to, as being Buchanan, Lafayette, Polk and Potwin—in other words the data contained in this data as being true with respect to auditoriums and gymnasiums, will you examine now particularly those schools I have indicated. I will take it one by one and ask you a question: Potwin, for example, you have the record shows that it has an auditorium but no gymnasium, is that correct?

A. That's right, it has a playroom but all schools have playrooms.

Q. Is that true of the negro schools?

A. They all have rooms that they do not use; any room that is not used can be called a playroom.

Q. I notice Polk Street now, the next one that Dr. Speer mentioned in his testimony, it's marked auditorium room used for auditorium purposes but no gymnasium, is that correct?

A. That's right; there is no gymnasium there.

Q. I notice the same before Lafayette, that your records show it has an auditorium room, facilities for an auditorium, but no gymnasium, is that right?

A. That's right.

Q. And I direct your attention to the same matter on Buchanan; your record shows it has an auditorium but [fol. 326] no gymnasium, is that correct?

A. That is correct.

Judge Mellott: Is the difference of opinion, take, for instance, Buchanan School, purely one of terminology? Now she refers to it as having an auditorium. As I understood it, counsel's statement was that there were two rooms capable of being thrown together for an assembly room, but they object to calling it an auditorium, is that the point of difference?

Mr. Goodell: That perhaps is the point of difference.

By Mr. Goodell:

Q. That is correct in some of these older schools, white schools, for example, like Lafayette and Polk and some of the others.

A. We have made auditoriums by remodeling in a number of schools. Now the auditorium, what we call auditorium at Buchanan, has a stage; it has seating. The only difference, if they do not wish to have the whole room included in the auditorium, they may pull a sliding door closed and not use the entire auditorium.

Q. Now, are you familiar and is it part of your job and are you familiar with the ordinary maintenance and operation of the school system with respect to furnishing of supplies upon requisition, accessories and needed supplies to properly make the school function?

[fol. 327] A. Yes, sir; I am the business manager of the schools; purchase all the supplies.

Q. You are familiar, then, with the practice and policy that actually has been adopted and used by the board in that respect in the furnishing of supplies.

BLEED THROUGH

A. Yes, sir.

Q. State, if you know, as a matter of policy, whether there has ever been any distinction shown between furnishing supplies when requested to negro schools as compared to white schools in the elementary system?

A. There is no distinction made between colored and white schools.

Q. They are operated, in other words, the whole thing is operated as a school system, is it?

A. That's right; it's a school system, and we operate entirely on the need of the school.

Q. And do you know what factors—strike that. Are you familiar with the factors, by reason of board policy and administrative practice, that Dr. McFarland and the board uses actually in fixing teachers' salaries in the entire school system, inclusive of these elementary schools.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What are those factors?

A. Salaries—you mean the salaries?

Q. How are they arrived at?

[fol. 328] A. Salaries are determined by education, by experience and how well the job is being done.

Q. Teaching experience, educational attainments?

A. That's right.

Q. And actual manner in which the teacher has performed his duties, is that right?

A. That's right.

Q. If I understand you correctly, then, you might have a teacher with the same number of years experience and the same educational attainments, but one that didn't have as good performance record; in the case of one that had a good performance record might get more money than another one having all the other qualities except that one.

A. He might; he also might have extra duties.

Q. Extra duties.

A. That's right.

Q. State whether or not the Board, as a matter of policy by Dr. McFarland and the board, in fixing these salaries there has ever been any other factors applied to the negro school teachers not applied to the white teachers in fixing those salaries?

Mr. Carter: Your Honor, all the things brought out, I think, so far have been stipulated to, particularly the salaries.

Mr. Goodell: They wouldn't stipulate on that, and I [fol. 329] have it in my stipulation and I have it marked they wouldn't stipulate.

Judge Huxman: She may answer. I didn't think there was any issue made on it. There is no evidence whatever to show anything to the contrary, but she may answer.

By Mr. Goodell:

Q. Are the same factors used, in other words, in fixing salaries in teachers contracts—I mean the same factors observed and actually followed in fixing salaries for both negro and white teachers?

A. Yes, sir, exactly the same.

Mr. Goodell: I believe that is all.

Cross-examination.

By Mr. Carter:

Q. Miss Mifflin, you said you were the clerk of the Board of Education?

A. That's right.

Q. I think you testified that—as to an exhibit with regard to the school program that this program was carried out throughout the school system, is that correct?

A. That's right.

Q. Among your duties as clerk of the board, are you the person who goes and visits the schools and examines them and inspects them; are those—is that included in your duties?

A. Yes, it is; I call on all schools.

[fol. 330] Q. I see. Now, with regard to the books that are held, if there is any difference between the books that are held by the white schools and those that are held by the negroes, if I understand your testimony correctly, you would attribute that to donations by the P. T. A. organization, is that right?

A. That's right.

BLEED THROUGH

Q. Is it or is it not a fact that if these books do—if they are donated by the P. T. A. they belong to the school or the Board of Education or what happens?

Mr. Goodell: We object to that as calling for a conclusion, legal conclusion, of this witness, where title is in the books.

Judge Huxman: She said she's in charge of the school system for that purpose. She may answer.

The Witness: They are usually gifts to the school. If they are a gift, then they become the property of the school.

By Mr. Carter:

Q. They become the property of the school to which they are given.

A. However, we wouldn't feel that we could go—if a gift would go to a certain school, we wouldn't feel that we should go in and remove it to another school.

Q. I understand that. They become the property of the school to which it's given, and they remain there, is that correct?

[fol. 331] A. That's right.

Judge Huxman: You may step aside, please.

(Witness excused.)

Kenneth McFarland, having been previously sworn, assumed the stand and testified as follows:

Direct examination.

By Mr. Goodell:

Q. State your name again for the record.

A. Kenneth McFarland.

Q. And you are the superintendent of schools of the City of Topeka.

A. Yes.

Q. How long have you held that post?

A. Nine years; since 1942.

Q. How long have you been in educational work?

Judge Huxman: Wasn't all of that gone into yesterday. I thought the doctor was asked his qualifications.

The Witness: No.

Mr. Goodell: I don't recall it.

Judge Huxman: Proceed.

Mr. Goodell: I will dismiss it, though, if the Court doesn't want to hear it. I will make this very brief.

[fol. 332] By Mr. Goodell:

Q. What is your educational background?

A. Bachelor's Degree from Pittsburgh Teachers College here in Kansas and a Master's Degree from Columbia University and doctorate degree from Stanford University.

Q. How long have you been in education work, Doctor?

A. Twenty-four years.

Q. When you came to Topeka, state whether or not the elementary schools were being operated, separated as to negro and whites in the first six grades.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You understand, do you, that the statute of Kansas is a permissive one, that the Board of Education may—it's up to their discretion—according to statute.

A. Yes.

Q. —to so operate the elementary schools.

A. Yes, I understand that.

Q. Has it ever been your policy that you recommended to the board to change that operation actually?

A. We have—no; we have never recommended that we change the fundamental structure of the elementary schools.

Q. Why not.

Judge Huxman: Mr. Goodell, what would that establish in this lawsuit?

Mr. Goodell: Well, I think he, as an administrator—I am leading to something. I can't ask more than one question [fol. 333] at a time.

Judge Huxman: I know, but what's the purpose? If the statute gives the city permission to operate the schools, and he testified they are operating separate schools, what difference would it make whether they had or had not considered changing?

BLEED THROUGH

Mr. Goodell: It might make some difference. We had a lot of expert testimony here on a hypothetical community or hypothetical situation, and I want to show the human factor in the custom and usage in this community, whether he knows it and whether or not it had something to do with the operation of the schools, why they operated——

Judge Huxman: Whether the city authorities had considered discarding what they had a right under the statute to do or hadn't considered, wouldn't prove any issue in this case.

By Mr. Goodell:

Q. Have you ever, as an administrator of schools, considered it part of your business to formulate custom and—social customs and usage in the community?

A. Mr. Goodell, I think that point is extremely significant; in fact, it's probably the major factor in why the Board of Education is defending this lawsuit, and that is that we have never considered it, and there is nothing in the record historically, that it's the place of the public school system to dictate the social customs of the people [fol. 334] who support the public school system.

Q. Do you say that the separation of the schools that we have is in harmony with the public opinion, weight of public opinion, in this community?

A. We have no objective evidence that the majority sentiment of the public would desire a change in the fundamental structure.

Q. Now, we will get on to the actual operation. Have there been any distinction in the question of fixing salaries, furnishing accessories or supplies to the negro schools as opposed to the white schools?

A. No. I think we found what we thought were some discrepancies when we first came here in salaries. Those were corrected; we adopted a minimum salary of $2400 for inexperienced teachers with degrees; that was the basis where we started and, from that point on, there has been no discrepancy of any kind.

Q. Do you take into account, as head of the schools, as recommending to the Board of Education the matter of the color of the teacher at all in fixing that teacher's contract salary?

A. No.

Q. You have heard Mrs. Mifflin testify to the factors that are considered, is that correct?

A. The three factors plus the total responsibilities in- [fol. 335] volved in the job.

Q. Some teachers have more responsibilities than others.

A. That's right.

Q. Of course a principal, that would be naturally true. Now, in respect to furnishing, honoring requisitions and furnishing all supplies, are the same factors considered by you and the Board of Education in respect to that, without regard to whether the school is white or negro school?

A. Oh, yes, no difference.

Q. There has been some testimony here about curriculum. Is the same curriculum followed in both the negro and white schools, elementary schools.

A. Yes, they are all under the same director of elementary schools, same supervisor of elementary schools and same special supervisors, no difference.

Q. Your administrative set-up is entirely one for the operation of the entire school system, is it not?

A. Yes, it's considered twenty-two elementary schools.

Q. Yes. In any particular, whether I have asked you or not, is there the slightest difference in the actual operation and maintenance of the school system between the negro and the white schools the way it's carried on?

A. Nothing done on the basis of color. They are merely treated as individuals.

Q. Do you know whether or not this operation has been [fol. 336] well received in this community?

A. Well, I feel that it has, in the main, been well received.

Q. State whether or not the school system has been commented on by national authorities, educational authorities.

Judge Huxman: Doctor, you need not answer that question. Mr. Goodell, that is not an issue in this case, has nothing to do with the problems concerning the Court.

BLEED THROUGH

Mr. Goodell: I thought they were trying to show we had some poor schools. Maybe not. That is all.

Judge Huxman: You may cross-examine.

Cross examination.

By Mr. Carter:

Q. Mr. McFarland, I think you said that you didn't consider it the function of the Board of Education to go against the prevailing opinion with regard to the maintenance of public schools.

A. I said the social customs of the people. I didn't think it was the purpose of the school system to dictate the social customs of the people who support the schools. That has been our policy.

Q. Now, how do you know that social customs of Topeka require the maintenance of separate schools at the elementary school level?

A. I said we had no objective evidence that the majority [fol. 337] of the people wishes to change in the fundamental structure which we don't have.

Q. Would you say that there is a difference in the social or public opinion or social customs with regard to the maintenance of segregated schools above the elementary school level?

A. I didn't say that.

Q. Would you say, I am asking you a question.

A. I don't know; I wouldn't pass on that. You see, we are operating the schools under essentially the same structure that we took them over in 1942.

Q. But you are operating schools that have a mixed characteristic, mixed characteristics, rather, do you not? You are operating schools that are segregated at the elementary school level, integrated beyond. Now why does the Board of Education feel that they are maintaining their —they are in accord with public opinion by maintaining that type of operation?

A. Well, we have——

Mr. Goodell: Just a minute. Object to this question because it assumes as a part of the question—assumes that part of this integration is caused by public policy of the board. The Supreme Court decision in the case of Graham vs. Board of Education, decided that there couldn't be a separation in the seventh and eighth grade where we had [fol. 338] a junior and senior set up. There is a policy set up on it of cities of the first class, all except Kansas City, which is controlled by another statute, so it isn't a matter of policy of the board.

Judge Huxman: I doubt if there is very much value to this whole line of questions.

Mr. Goodell: My point is that the law compels them to have integrated system as to junior high and high school.

Judge Huxman: The witness may answer the question.

(The last preceding question was read by the reporter.)

Mr. Goodell: If the Court please, I insist again my objection is proper. He is asking the doctor to distinguish the board forming a policy, saying in the elementary grades they will be separate and in the others it won't; it isn't a matter of choice with them as to junior high and high school. It's fixed by law.

Judge Huxman: The objection will be overruled.

The Witness: The answer is essentially that given by the attorney. The board has had no vote upon whether or not they would segregate the schools above the sixth grade [fol. 339] nor have the people—the public that they represent.

By Mr. Carter:

Q. I see. So, actually, you are not maintaining—you can't really say you are maintaining the schools in accord with social custom. You merely have kept consant the status quo as you found it when you came here. You are maintaining segregated schools merely because they were here when you arrived; that's all you can say, isn't that true?

A. We have, as I stated, no objective evidence that there is any substantial desire for a change among the people that the board represents.

Judge Huxman: May I ask counsel on both sides, assuming that is true, assuming the schools are maintained in accordance with social customs and the wishes of the people, or that they are not, what bearing does that have on the right to so maintain them under the Fourteenth Amendment?

BLEED THROUGH

Mr. Goodell: Judge Parker in his opinion that was handed down by that court of South Carolina, goes into that very, very carefully.

Judge Huxman: Presently we are not interested in that. I am asking—this is——

Mr. Goodell: Our theory of the equal protection of the laws——

Judge Huxman: Mr. Goodell, the question is what the [fol. 340] Fourteenth Amendment warrants and what it doesn't. We don't care what social customs provide. That is the reason I can't see any use in pursuing this line of argument unduly—this line of questioning.

Mr. Carter: I agree with that, Your Honor, but—— Judge Huxman: Then let's not pursue it too far. I don't want to cut you off because Mr. Goodell opened it up, but don't pursue it unnecessarily.

Mr. Carter: I am not going to pursue it any further, but I thought I shouldn't allow it to remain in the record unchallenged. That is the only reason I have asked the question.

By Mr. Carter:

Q. Now, I have just a few more questions, Mr. McFarland. Are you familiar with J. Murray Lee, who is the dean of the School of Education of the State of Washington; are you familiar with him; do you know him?

A. No, I don't know him.

Q. Do you know his wife, Doris Mae Lee, who is the co-author of "Learning to Read Through Experience"?

A. Do I know her?

Q. Are you familiar——

A. I just know there is such a person.

Q. In a book which both of them collaborated on—— [fol. 341] Mr. Goodell: What did you say? I didn't hear you.

Mr. Carter: Collaborated in writing.

By Mr. Carter:

Q. This statement appears, and I would like to get your views on this: "No longer is the curriculum to be considered a fixed body of subject matter to be learned. We realize only too well that the curriculum for each child is the sum total of all of his experiences which are in any way affected by the school. However rich or valuable any printed course of study may seem to be, the child benefits not at all if he does not have those experiences in classroom."

Now, would you agree or disagree with that statement?

A. Well, you lift one statement like that out of its context in an educational philosophy—it's a little difficult to say whether you would agree with the single statement or not. We would have to know the background of that, what lead up to it.

Q. The statement is—follows a philosophy that the sum total of a child's experience throughout the school—is the curriculum, not merely the subjects in the school. Now, do you or do you not agree with that?

A. I would agree with that in principle, but, of course, you understand when you go to that theory of education that the child is in the public schools a small percentage of [fol. 342] his total living hours. That puts the curriculum over into a field that is largely out of control of the schools.

Q. It puts the curriculum certainly out of control of the school but insofar as the school provides the atmosphere and everything that is part of the curriculum, not only the books but everything else that goes into the—into his experience in the schools, is that right?

A. Anything that would have to do with motivation of learning.

Mr. Carter: That is all.

Judge Huxman: Is that all.

Mr. Carter: That is all.

Judge Huxman: You may step down.

Mr. Goodell: The defendant rests.

Judge Huxman: The defendant rests. Any rebuttal testimony?

Mr. Greenberg: Yes, Your Honor.

BLEED THROUGH

ERNEST MANHEIM, having been first duly sworn, testified on behalf of the plaintiffs in rebuttal as follows:

Direct examination.

By Mr. Greenberg:

Q. Would you please state your full name to the Court.

A. Ernest Manheim.

Q. What is your occupation, Mr. Manheim?

A. Professor of Sociology at the University of Kansas City.

[fol. 343] Q. What degrees do you hold and where were they earned?

A. A Ph.D. in sociology at the University of Leipzig, a Ph.D. in anthropology from the University of London.

Q. What is your field of special interest, Professor Manheim?

A. Social organization, juvenile delinquency and social theory.

Q. Have you published any articles in this particular field? Or any books?

Mr. Goodell: We don't want to interfere but we object to this if this is a repetition, simply cumulative of more expert opinion.

Mr. Greenberg: It is not, Your Honor.

Judge Huxman: What do you propose to rebut by the testimony of this witness? I take it you are qualifying him as an expert. Now just what testimony offered by the defendants are you proposing to rebut?

Mr. Greenberg: The clerk of the School Board stated that to the extent that there was a difference of library holdings between the colored and white schools, it was attributable to P. T. A. donations to the white schools. We intend to show that the maintenance of a segregated school system in Topeka has caused this difference in P. T. A. and community support of the colored as against the white schools.

Mr. Goodell: We object to that.

[fol. 344] Mr. Greenberg: Directly rebuts——

Judge Huxman: Just a minute. The doctor isn't a resident of this community, is he?

Mr. Greenberg: The doctor is not a resident of this community.

Judge Huxman: How could he know whether that is what caused this condition in Topeka?

Mr. Greenberg: Well, the doctor is a man who has studied social forces in nearby communities and, in qualifying as an expert, we believe that he will be competent to generalize from his studies and his experience.

Judge Huxman: How would that qualify him to testify that segregated schools in Topeka is what caused certain voluntary and independent groups to make donations of books to certain schools?

Mr. Greenberg: I don't want to give the doctor's testimony, but——

Judge Huxman: How could it tend to establish that?

Mr. Greenberg: I believe the doctor is going to testify that studies have shown that the distance which community support—the distance that community support is from a particular school determines the force of the community effectiveness of the community support.

Judge Huxman: How long is this testimony going to [fol. 345] take?

Mr. Greenberg: Perhaps five or ten minutes.

Judge Huxman: Frankly, the Court doubts if it is rebuttal testimony. If it's brief, we will give you the benefit of the doubt and let you go ahead. I don't think it rebuts anything.

(The last question was here read by the reporter.)

The Witness: Yes, I have published in my field in sociology six books; one of them deals with juvenile delinquency in Kansas City.

By Mr. Greenberg:

Q. Have you ever made any studies which would enable you to form a conclusion concerning the community support which a community gives to a school?

Mr. Goodell: We object to this as calling not for any fact, pure conjecture and guesswork and conclusion on the part of the witness.

BLEED THROUGH

Judge Huxman: He may answer.

The Witness: Inasmuch as I can generalize from experience in Kansas City, I would tend to say that a school which is far from the clientele's residence, from their parents, is weakened in its position to supervise the conduct of the children, and is—and it is the cooperation between the teachers and the parents tend to be weaker.

[fol. 346] Mr. Goodell: We object to this for the further reason it's not rebuttal. If anything, it's part of their case in chief and, for the further reason, that is opinion——

Judge Huxman: The objection to that question will be sustained. It isn't responsive; it doesn't rebut anything that has been offered in the case.

Mr. Greenberg: Well, Your Honor, I believe that the clerk of the Board of Education did testify that the discrepancy between the white and colored schools was attributable to discrepancies in P. T. A. support. We are trying to show that——

Judge Huxman: Didn't so testify. She testified that these additional books or extra books were the result of donations by P. T. A. organizations; that is what she testified to and——

Mr. Greenberg: I hope to establish by this witness that a weakened P. T. A. is caused by having children and parents great distance from the school which the children attend.

Mr. Goodell: Object to it for the further reason it's outside the scope of the pleadings; it's not an issue raised by the pleadings as being one or any of the grounds of inequality, so it's outside the scope of the issues.

[fol. 347] Judge Huxman: The majority of the Court feels that this testimony is not proper rebuttal testimony from the very nature of the explanation that you have given. The doctor could not testify that the discrimination, if you want to so refer to it, which results in the donation of books in Topeka to one school and not to another is caused by segregation. He could only give that as his theory that that will flow and result from segregation generally. But he knows nothing about Topeka. The objection will be sustained. We will receive no further evidence along this line.

Anything further?

Mr. Carter: We have nothing further.
Judge Huxman: Both parties rest?
Mr. Goodell: Yes, Your Honor.
Mr. Carter: Yes.

COLLOQUY BETWEEN COURT AND COUNSEL

Judge Huxman: We perhaps should take a short recess. We would like to ask counsel, is there a desire to argue this case orally?

Mr. Goodell: I would personally, my notion about it, I believe the Court has heard all the testimony, that we could perhaps aid the Court more in a written brief. I would like to submit a written brief, and I can have it ready inside of a week.

Judge Huxman: Does plaintiff desire to argue the case [fol. 348] to the Court?

Mr. Carter: Yes, we do, Your Honor.

Judge Huxman: You shall be afforded that opportunity. Will the defendant then want to argue the case?

Mr. Goodell: We will make a short argument.

Judge Huxman: How much time do you feel you would want to argue this case?

Mr. Carter: We would think, Your Honor, just about a half hour on opening, and we would like to have time for rebuttal.

Judge Huxman: How much time for rebuttal?

Mr. Carter: I should think approximately fifteen minutes.

Judge Huxman: Forty-five minutes, of which you take thirty minutes in the opening argument and fifteen in the closing; and how much does the defendant want?

Mr. Goodell: Twenty or thirty minutes, I think, will be sufficient.

Judge Huxman: We will take a five or ten-minute recess before we start into that phase.

(The court then, at 11:05 o'clock a. m., stood at recess until 11:15 o'clock a. m., at which time the following further proceedings were had:)

[fol. 349] Judge Huxman: Do you gentlemen desire the Court to keep a record of your time or will you do that yourselves?

BLEED THROUGH

Mr. Carter: I will do that, Your Honor.

Judge Huxman: All right, forty-five minutes, thirty for opening, fifteen for closing and, of course, the defendant, while they have only asked for twenty, if they should want not to exceed that, they will be given the same amount.

You may proceed.

Opening Argument on Behalf of Plaintiff

Mr. Carter: Involved in this case is a question of the constitutionality of the state statute, Section 72-1724, of the General Statutes of the State of Kansas which purports to give to the Boards of Education of cities of certain class the power to organize and maintain separate schools for the education of white and colored children, and I think that the reading of the wordage of the statute is very interesting. The statute says that such power as "to organize and maintain separate schools for the education of white and colored children, including the high schools in Kansas City, Kansas; no discrimination on account of color shall be made in high schools, except as provided herein; * * *."

Now, I think, that that is very interesting verbiage because, I think, there is a recognition, certainly the lan-[fol. 350] guage is a recognition by the framers of the statute, that the separation at the elementary school level was discrimination and is discrimination.

Now we rest our case on the question of the power of the state. We feel, one, that the state has no authority and no power to make any distinction or any classification among its citizenry based upon race and color alone. We think that this has been settled by the Supreme Court of the United States in a long line of cases which hold that in order for a classification to be constitutional it must be based on a real difference, a real and substantial difference which has pertinence to the legislative objective. The Supreme Court has also held in a series of cases that race and ancestry and color are irrelevant differences and cannot form the basis for any legislative action. The only exception to this provision has been in the cases involving the Japanese war cases which included—involved rights under the Fifth Amendment and the exception has been repeated by the Supreme Court of the United States after Hirabayashi vs. U. S. and other cases that were decided, Korematsu vs. United States, and the Supreme Court has repeated again and again when it has struck down a legislative or governmental action because it said it was based on race and race alone, the Supreme Court has said that there is absence of compelling necessity to support the [fol. 351] constitutionality of this statute and the only compelling necessity that we have found in the cases is a national emergency which, in the Hirabayashi case, the court decided even though it questioned the constitutionality of the Exclusion Act of the Japanese because of their ancestry; the Supreme Court felt that national interests were of such a nature that they could not interfere with the judgment of the War Department. But that is the only exception to this general theory which I think the Court is familiar with and the principle of law established by the Supreme Court that there can be no distinction, no classification, unless it is based upon a real and substantial difference, and race is not a real and substantial difference.

The other trend of the law is that the rights under the Fourteenth Amendment are individual rights. You cannot take away the individual's rights by classifying him or putting him in a group and therefore saying that we, on the average, treat the group well, therefore the individual, if he suffers he has to suffer because he is a member of the group. The Supreme Court of the United States has taken care of that in a series of cases which I think I need not mention but one particularly is Missouri ex rel Gaines vs. Canada; the other is the recent Sweatt vs. Painter, involving the admission of a negro to the University of Texas. [fol. 352] Another is the Henderson vs. U. S. which involved the right of negroes to eat any place on a dining car without the curtains or signs or distinctions based on race and color.

Now, in all of those cases the argument raised was that we are providing for negroes as a group about as much as we can. We are meeting the demand. It just happens that this individual—if this individual wants to eat in the dining car and the space we have reserved for him is filled, then even though there are vacant seats in the outer part of the dining car, the fact that he has to wait, he is no more disadvantaged than a white person who comes into the dining car and the place is filled, and he has to wait. The Supreme Court said in those cases that the Fourteenth Amendment granted individual rights, rights to the individual, and it was no answer to say that because the person was a member of a group or because of his number, because of the numbers of the group, that therefore he should not be accorded this right which the Fourteenth Amendment gives.

Now, I think that those two trends of the law—those are the two trends of the law which presently exist, and those two trends, I think, make it clear that no other conclusion can be reached in this case other than that this statute is unconstitutional.

[fol. 353] I realize that there is a body of law which is classified under the separate but equal doctrine of Plessy vs. Ferguson which would seem to give authority to a state to maintain segregation, but it is our contention, and I will attempt to show—I will attempt to demonstrate to the Court that whatever potency that doctrine may have had that by virtue of the present classification doctrine which has been established by the Supreme Court of the United States by the emphasis and reemphasis of the individual right under the Fourteenth Amendment, the Plessy vs. Ferguson doctrine of separate but equal has been whittled away.

Now, it is interesting, in examining the cases under this doctrine, in the field of education to find that in none of the Supreme Court cases has this doctrine been applied. It was mentioned—the nearest case in which it came to being applied, rather, was a case which was decided sometime ago, I think about 1925, Gong Lum vs. Rice. In that case Mr. Chief Justice Taft assumed that the Supreme Court of the United States had followed and had made as to law the separate but equal doctrine of Plessy vs. Ferguson, but the real problem in that case was not the application of the separate but equal doctrine; the real problem in Gong Lum vs. Rice is whether a person of Chinese extraction who was classified by the state as a negro had [fol. 354] a right to being so classified. The petitioner, the Chinese child, did not question the power of the state to make a classification; it questioned the use of the power in putting her, as a Chinese, being classified as a negro for purposes of education, so that the problem which we here present as to whether or not the state has the power to classify on the basis of race, was not presented in Gong Lum vs. Rice and certainly was not passed upon. The Gaines case, the Sipuel case, Sweatt case, the McLaurin case, the McKissick vs. Carmichael, and I will merely mention it because it is a more recent case and it may well be that the Court hasn't read it; I am sure that you are familiar with the other cases that I will not have to go into, but in McKissick vs. Carmichael involves the right of a negro to attend the University of North Carolina School of Law. The state maintained a separate and segregated school at the North Carolina College for Negroes. The case was lost in the lower court on the grounds that it would be better for negroes to go to a segregated school than it would be for them to go to the university—to the University of North Carolina. On appeal to the United States Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit the judgment of the court below was reversed on authority of the U. S. Supreme Court in Sweatt vs. Painter, and the Supreme Court, on June 4, 1951, refused to review the case. Now, the interesting [fol. 355] thing about that case, if the Court please, is that here in North Carolina one of the oldest negro law schools in the country had been operated. It had been established and had been operating since 1939—the oldest school. It was conceded that the state was making an effort to maintain a school for the education of negroes but, because of the segregation, because that school was segregated, the Court of Appeals held, consistent with the case of Sweatt vs. Painter, the state had no power to make any such distinctions.

Now I think that, if anything, the only argument that can be made with regard to this problem is not whether the law, as it now stands, is for the proposition that the maintenance of separate schools can be maintained by the state. I think that the law, as it now stands with the classification cases, with the individual right under the Fourteenth Amendment, I think that the inevitable conclusion must be that segregation, the maintenance by the state of segregated facilities on the basis of race, is unconstitutional.

The question sometimes may arise with regard to whether or not even though this is the law, it is expedient for the Court to reach a decision at this time, and I think that that seems to me to probably be apparently the trend of [fol. 356] the present cases. The United States Supreme Court recently also handled a case involving interstate travel and, in this case, in which it denied to review on May 28, 1951, the Fourth Circuit held that Jim Crow coaches—the separate coaches for negroes and whites on a north-south journey was unconstitutional. The Supreme Court refused to review this. Now I see no distinction between Jim Crow coaches on a north-south journey than between Jim Crow coaches on a south-north journey. The Court made the distinction, and the law as I understand it at the present time, applies only to north-south journies. I think that the distinction was made because the Court felt that it could and should strike down illegal regulations involving racial distinctions of a person who comes from an area in which they do not have to submit to that, going into an area in which they do, even though they pass the imaginary Mason-Dixon Line.

Now, however, I think the facts show that here in Topeka the time is now ripe for decision and for this court to use its power to strike down this statute. The system in Topeka is operated with eighteen schools for white children and four schools for negroes. The white children attend the schools in the territories in which they live. Negroes attend four schools that are located in I think for the most part in the center of town, with one in an area which I believe is called North Topeka. A number of negro children have to be [fol. 357] transported to these schools in buses. We have submitted testimony to show that insofar as the time spent on the bus takes away from the child the opportunity to play and to learn, to play rather, that he is being deprived of something of value to his education, and he is being deprived of this in this instance because the state says that the City of Topeka can, and the City of Topeka has decided to maintain separate schools at the elementary school level.

Now also in the City of Topeka there is a school system which is different from that at the elementary school level. At the junior high school level and the high school level we have mixed schools. Now, defendants have indicated, and I realize that this is because the statute says that there can be no discrimination at the high school level; however, in this type of mixed situation where on one hand you have for only six grades of the same public school system you maintain segregation, with the other six grades you do not maintain segregation, then certainly the interest, whatever interest the state may have in the maintenance of segregation, if it could be argued that it has such an interest, and therefore a court should withhold its authority to strike down that power, whatever interest it has, it seems that the picture of it maintaining in one end of the system for most of the system and not maintaining it in another, in[fol. 358] dicates that if there is such an interest, it is of minor importance and should be disregarded.

We maintain, of course, that the state has no power in this area. But this case, I think, is as close to McLaurin vs. The Board of Regents of Oklahoma as any other case that we have been familiar with. If the Court will remember, in that case a negro, or a group of negroes, were admitted to the University of Oklahoma. They were given the same teachers, the same textbooks; they apparently got the same education, that is, in terms of subject matter. But, because they were negroes, they were forced in the classroom to sit at separate seats; they were forced to sit at separate benches in the library; they were forced to eat at separate tables in the cafeteria. In reviewing this case, the United States Supreme Court felt that here was an area in which it was apparent that this type of segregation was ridiculous and meaningless. If McLaurin could be admitted into the classroom, necessarily he should be able to be permitted into the classroom without distinction or difference based upon race and color. The Court found that these arbitrary distinctions, putting him aside, stigmatized him and interfered with his ability to learn and with the learning process.

Now we contend the same thing here. We contend that [fol. 359] this statute, one, that the state has no power to enforce the statute in the first place, and, two, that if it has such power, that by making a difference at the high school level and the junior high level, whatever interest it may have, that interest is not now of any importance because it is clear that there is no distinction between maintaining a power to maintain segregation in the first six grades of school and the power to maintain segregation at the junior high and the high school level. So that with this mixed situation we think that it's even more important that the power of this Court should be exercised in striking down this statute.

We have introduced testimony to show that there are differences, substantial differences, between various of the white schools as contrasted to the negro schools. We have shown that on the average in terms of teacher preparation, subject matter taught, buildings, and so forth, that on the average the school system here, as between the negro and the white schools, there is not too much difference except for this factor: We have shown that 45% of the white children attend schools newer than the newest colored schools and that 66% of them attend in buildings newer than the average age of the negro school, and that on the average the insured value per classroom of the negro school is approximately $4,000 below that of the white school. We have also [fol. 360] shown that in terms of books which are held by the various schools that the white schools maintain a newer supply of books; that the white schools have better books and that therefore the book holdings of the schools, as between negro and white, is substantially different.

Now, the defendants attempt to defend this on the grounds that the P. T. A. is the cause of this difference. It is our contention that in spite of where the books come from and it has been testified that when they get into the school they belong to that particular school; that without regard to where they come from, the fact that they belong to the school and are held by the school is really the factor which makes for the difference and that has to be considered.

We have submitted testimony also to show that the separation of negroes and whites in the elementary school of the school grades of Topeka is harmful to the development of the child, although it has been conceded that the subject-matters taught are the same, and in our definition of what is a school curriculum we have attempted to point out in the record that the school curriculum is the sum total of the child's experience from the time he leaves home to go to school until the time that he returns, and therefore the fact that negroes have to ride buses, those [fol. 361] who do, and cannot go to the school which is within walking distance of them, therefore they cannot come home for hot lunches, that they are required to travel across the town merely because they are negroes and attend a segregated school and makes it impossible for us to say that the curriculum at the segregated negro schools are equal to those at the white schools.

We have also attempted to establish that, if anything, the maintenance of the segregated system at the first six grades and then integration at the high school, junior high school level, places an added burden upon the child because that is the time that he is meeting the problems of adolescence and attempting to develop into a man or into a woman and that with those additional burdens upon him, we think this is an additional hardship which makes this statute, in our view, unreasonable.

Now, with that in mind we feel that we have sufficiently established that the separation of negroes and whites in the public schools of Topeka is a denial of equal protection because of the Fourteenth Amendment, that this statute which the city or Board of Education under which it purports to operate, is unconstitutional and should be so declared by this Court, and we also contend that by virtue of the facts which we have set in the record with regard to the stigma on the negro child because of race and color [fol. 362] at what is considered the most crucial age of his development, that the injuries which are established here, we have put on evidence to show that these injuries are likely permanent and that they cannot be corrected merely by introducing them into the junior high school at a later age. In fact, we show that it probably by making this introduction to the junior high school on an integrated basis at the adolescent age, probably compounds the injury which has been suffered at the elementary school level and, for these reasons, we think we have established the rights of the plaintiffs for the issuance of the injunction for which we have prayed and we submit that this Court should declare this statute to be unconstitutional and order the Board of Education of Topeka to admit all persons into its schools without regard to race or color.

Judge Huxman: In assigning time for argument, we overlooked the State of Kansas represented by the attorney general. That was unintentional. How much time, Mr. McQueary, if any, do you desire to argue in behalf of the constitutionality of the state statute which you are defending here.

Mr. McQueary: If the Court please, I think we can explain our position very fully and amply well in a brief [fol. 363] on the matter of the constitutionality of the statute.

Judge Huxman: All right. You may proceed with the argument.

Do you desire the Court to keep track of your time, or are you going to keep track of your time?

Mr. Brewster: Perhaps you better keep track, Your Honor.

Judge Huxman: How much time do you desire to take in the opening argument, Mr. Brewster?

Mr. Brewster: I would say twenty, twenty-five minutes.

Judge Huxman: Well, now, you say which? I can't keep——

Mr. Brewster: Twenty-five minutes.

Argument on Behalf of Defendants

Your Honor, I would like to touch on one point mentioned by counsel for the plaintiffs, and that is attempting to lay some stress on the fact that the distance traveled by a pupil in attending school has some bearing upon the question before this Court.

There are a number of cases to the effect that the mere fact that certain colored school children must travel farther to reach a colored school than any white child is required to travel to reach the white school, is not necessarily a deprivation of equal advantages. There are a lot of cases on that. They are collected in an annotation in A. L. R. [fol. 364] Then, going to a United States Supreme Court decision of Gong Lum vs. Rice, in there the Court pointed out that there was no colored school within the district in which this—school for other than whites; that involved a Chinese girl being declared as ineligible to attend a white school; but they did point out in that case that there was a school in the county in which this particular school district was located where she could attend and therefore there could be no objection made on constitutional ground. The distance you travel is immaterial, and I would say that that is especially true in our situation where the entire city of Topeka constitutes a school district and where the evidence, testimony, shows that there are a number of white students who are required to walk to school a greater distance than these colored children who are furnished transportation, and we have the Kansas case in which this question was raised, Reynolds vs. The Board of Education—well, I believe it's the Wright case, and there the Supreme Court pointed out that the question was raised that they had to attend Buchanan School which was twenty blocks farther than a white school they could attend, and our court pointed out the fact that transportation was furnished and therefore the question of distance traveled would have no bearing on the proposition. Now that is all I want to say right [fol. 365] now on distance traveled.

The plaintiffs in this case, of course, are by these cases attempting to have the courts abandon the separate but equal doctrine which was enunciated in the case of Plessy vs. Ferguson, which appears in 163 U. S. 537. It has been mentioned by counsel for the plaintiff, and they mention or contend that the more recent descisions have whittled away the effect of that decision and, of course, in that connection, they rely upon the case of Sweatt vs. Painter, which is the most recent case on this point. I will come to that in just a minute. First, I would like to call attention to the fact that there have been a number of decisions to the effect that establishing separate schools for white and colored children does not violate the constitutional right to equal privileges and immunities if equal advantages are afforded for each class.

Now, defendants admit that there has been engrafted upon this separate but equal doctrine the requirement that you must afford equal opportunity, and it's our position that under the facts stipulated to here and the evidence, that there is no real question but what we do afford equal educational opportunities to the colored folks, and we finally get down to there one point and that is that segregation in and [fol. 366] of itself constitutes a discrimination.

School segregation statutes have been before the United States Supreme Court in a number of cases and at no time have they held that these state statutes are unconstitutional.

Now, getting down to the case of Sweatt vs. Painter, we have here the opinion of the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of South Carolina. This is the opinion of the court and, while it is not published, it is, of course, authority—Harry Briggs, Jr., et al, Plaintiff, vs. R. W. Elliott, et al.

Judge Mellott: You mean that is the last case that came down a year or two ago.

Mr. Brewster: That is correct. This is the opinion of the court, and it was decided June 23, 1951. I would like to first call attention to this Sweatt case. In the opening paragraph of the opinion of that case the Court said this:

"This case and McLaurin vs. Oklahoma State Regents" and cites "present different aspects of this general question: To what extent does the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment limit the power of a state to distinguish between students of different races in professional and graduate education in a state university?" [fol. 367] In other words, the Court specifically restricted that to professional and graduate education in a state university. Then the Court pointed out that broader issues had been urged for their consideration, but adhering to the rule that constitutional questions are made as narrow as possible, and the Court says that was—is not necessary to consider, and the point I am making is that the Sweatt and the McLaurin cases do not in anyway detract from the effect of Plessy vs. Ferguson which is still the law.

Now, reviewing Plessy vs. Ferguson, that is the case which involved the state statute providing for separate railway carriages for white and colored races, and it was a Louisiana statute, and it provided that the passengers be assigned to the coaches according to their race by the conductor, and the Court held that it did not violate—deprive a colored person of any rights under the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal constitution. That is the case from which stems this separate but equal doctrine which the defendants think is still applicable and which the plaintiffs, of course, are seeking to overturn.

Here's one thing the Court said:

"So far, then, as a conflict with the Fourteenth Amendment is concerned, the case reduces itself to the question [fol. 368] whether the statute of Louisiana is a reasonable regulation, and with respect to this there must necessarily be a large discretion on the part of the legislature. In determining the question of reasonableness it is at liberty to act with reference to the established usages, customs and traditions of the people, and with a view to the promotion of their comfort, and the preservation of the public peace and good order. Gauged by this standard, we cannot say that a law which authorizes or even requires the separation of the two races in public conveyances is unreasonable, or more obnoxious to the Fourteenth Amendment than the acts of Congress requiring separate schools for colored children in the District of Columbia, the constitutionality of which does not seem to have been questioned, or the corresponding acts of state legislatures.

"We consider the underlying fallacy of the plaintiff's argument to consist in the assumption that the enforced separation of the two races stamps the colored race with a badge of inferiority. If this be so, it is not by reason of anything found in the act, but solely because the colored race chooses to put that construction upon it. The argument necessarily assumes that if, as has been more than once the case, and is not unlikely to be so again, the colored race should become the dominant power in the state legislature, [fol. 369] and should enact a law in precisely similar terms, it would thereby relegate the white race to an inferior position. We imagine that the white race, at least, would not acquiesce in this assumption. The argument also assumes that social prejudices may be overcome by legislation, and that equal rights cannot be secured to the negro except by an enforced commingling of the two races. We cannot accept this proposition. If the two races are to meet upon terms of social equality, it must be the result of natural affinities, a mutual appreciation of each other's merits and a voluntary consent of individuals."

Judge Huxman: Mr. Brewster, I don't know——

Mr. Brewster: I am about through with that.

Judge Huxman: I was going to say that on the Circuit Court we do not care to have reading from an opinion.

Mr. Brewster: I want to point out that Plessy vs. Ferguson, which establishes the separate but equal doctrine and the basis upon which they go, and that is that this regulation that this is a part of the police power of the state. Now, it has been repeatedly held, and that is part—that is the basis of the decision in the South Carolina case, that each state determines for itself, subject to the observ-[fol. 370] ance of fundamental rights and liberties guaranteed by the federal constitution, how it shall exercise the police power and that the power to legislate with respect to safety, morals, health and general welfare and that in no field—in no field is this right of the several states more clearly recognized than in that of public education.

Well, now, the case—the South Carolina case—bases their decision, and I won't quote a great deal from it on the proposition that it's within the police power of the state to segregate these schools if they want to, but they must provide equal educational facilities.

Now, speaking of the Sweatt vs. Painter case which, of course, it will be found the plaintiffs rely on that to a great extent; that dealt with a professional or graduate school. We are here dealing with an elementary school system which, assuming that the student goes through high school and college, this segregation exists in less than one-half of the normal educational, formal educational, period. "At this level" I would like to quote just briefly from this opinion, "At this level as good education can be afforded in negro schools as in white schools and the thought of establishing professional contacts does not enter into the picture. Moreover, education at this level is not a matter of voluntary choice on the part of the student, but of compulsion by the [fol. 371] state."

Now, I would like to also call attention to the fact that in Sweatt vs. Painter the Supreme Court of the United States specifically refused to overrule Plessy vs. Ferguson and, in that respect, I think it strengthens the opinion and shows that the present segregation and separation and equality is still recognized.

Now, there has been testimony to the effect that mixed schools would give a better education. But, on the other hand, it's been indicated that mixed schools might result in additional racial friction due to the fact that the colored student would be greatly outnumbered and you'd still have that inferior feeling.

I would like to, with the Court's permission, quote just a little more from this South Carolina opinion; I just got it this morning or I would have tried to give it without quoting it:

"The federal courts would be going far outside their constitutional function were they to attempt to prescribe educational policies for the state in such matters, however desirable such policies might be in the opinion of some sociologists or educators. For the federal courts to do so, would result not only in interference with local affairs by an agency of the federal government, but also in the substitution of the judicial for the legislative process in what [fol. 372] is essentially a legislative matter." In other words continuing the theory that this is a matter of the police power, and the state has the right to make this regulation.

We submit that under the facts which are stipulated, there is established—it is established that there is no inequality of educational facilities and, furthermore, that it is within the province of the state to determine what regulations necessary under its police power which, of course, is to promote the peace and the welfare of the people of that state, and, as far as the opinions of some sociologists or educators are concerned, we are in agreement with what the Court decided in South Carolina that it would not be within the province of a federal court or any federal agency to adopt those views regardless of what the state might consider to be the proper regulation under the police powers.

Judge Huxman: You may proceed, Mr. Goodell.

BLEED THROUGH

Mr. Goodell: I prefer to—if we are given authority to file briefs, I will waive argument.

Judge Huxman: You will waive your argument. All right, the plaintiff may close the argument, then.

Closing Argument on Behalf of Plaintiff

Mr. Carter: Your Honor, I just have a few comments to make.

[fol. 373] I remember the last point that counsel for the defendants made about the statements of sociologists and educators. I would like to point the Court's attention again to the decision in McLaurin vs. The Board of Regents where what was considered in that case to be crucial to the decision was the mental attitude of the negro and the impact of segregation upon him mentally, and therefore it was held that he was deprived of the equal protection of the laws in the segregated educational system.

Now, I have to congratulate the attorneys for the Board of Education on being much more efficient than, at least, I am, because I had hoped that we could have the South Carolina opinion ourselves and that we could quote from the dissent, but we were unable to get it.

Judge Mellott: We have a copy of it.

Mr. Carter: No, thank you. But, at any rate, if the Court please, I think that although these two decisions certainly, McLaurin and Sweatt, were limited, as counsel indicated, to the graduate and professional schools, it was not necessary for the Court to have made any such limitation because that would have been obvious because they applied to graduate and professional schools anyway, but the United States Supreme Court, in a recent case, Rice vs. Arnold, which I don't remember the exact date of the decision, I think it was about October 16, 1950; I don't [fol. 374] believe it's yet reported—that case involved a question of the separate days for the use of a golf course in Miami; negroes were given certain days of the week and whites were given the rest of the time. The matter was appealed through the Florida Supreme Court to the U. S. Supreme Court, and the question raised was whether or not the separation and giving of this separate time to negroes and not permitting them to use the golf course without discrimination based on race or color was a denial of the equal protection clause, the golf course being municipally owned. The Supreme Court took the case, granted certiorari, reversed and remanded in the light of the McLaurin and Sweatt opinions.

Now, I think that that is clear evidence at least that the Supreme Court realized and certainly feels that the decisions and the principles which it enunciated in Sweatt and McLaurin have wide application and cannot be limited in the narrow scope of a professional school or a law school. I believe that what the Supreme Court, of course, in Plessy vs. Ferguson—the Supreme Court refused to overrule Plessy vs. Ferguson, refused to apply it or refused to reexamine it, but I don't believe that counsel for the defendants can take too much hope in that in view of the decision which was reached. The two decisions reached were to the effect that segregation, at least at the level at [fol. 375] which the decision was handed down, were unconstitutional in the law school and in the graduate schools and I might also add that Plessy vs. Ferguson applied to railroads and not to education and, although it has somehow been taken over into the educational field, it is really a railroad case. However, I think that actually what—with the trend of the law, I think that the trend of the law is to such an extent that it is impossible to reach any other decision except that the State of Kansas has no power to order segregation. I think also that here this is no situation—this is not applicable to South Carolina; the two states are entirely different. There is not the vested interest in the maintenance of segregation in Kansas as there is in South Carolina or in Georgia. This is clear, by virtue of the fact that the state forbids it at one level even though it permits it at another, and I think that what should be applied in this case is the rule that at least if the segregation is unconstitutional, and I think that the Supreme Court cases inevitably point to that end, that a declaration of unconstitutionality should be made in an area in which it is ripe. The time is ripe for such a decision to be reached, and I think that certainly in Kansas, with the situation as it is, that the time is now ripe for this Court to strike down the statute here in issue and to declare [fol. 376] that the State of Kansas has no power to maintain segregation in its public school system.

BLEED THROUGH

Judge Huxman: Before the Court adjourns, the Court wants to compliment the parties on both sides for their fairness in the presentation of this case, the spirit of cooperation exhibited by all, to have a speedy determination of the issues in the trial of the case. I think this case was tried within less than ten days after the issues were made up and concluded, and we feel that we want to have as speedy a determination by the Court as can be handed down, giving counsel an opportunity to file briefs because, if this law is declared unconstitutional, certainly the City of Topeka is—wants to have it done as soon as possible before the beginning of the fall school term and all those matters. So we are all interested in having the matter determined just as expeditiously as it can be done, affording everybody an opportunity to prepare and file their briefs.

Now, the questions are comparatively simple to state and quite difficult to answer. There are only two questions in the case; one is, are the facilities, as I see them, are the facilities which are afforded by Topeka in its separate schools, comparable; that is one question, and the other is, granting that they are, is segregation unconstitutional notwithstanding, in light of the Fourteenth Amendment. As [fol. 377] I get it, those are the two points in the case, is that right?

Mr. Carter: Yes, sir.

COLLOQUY BETWEEN COURT AND COUNSEL.

Judge Huxman: There is nothing else.

Now, ordinarily, of course, the plaintiffs prepare and file their briefs and the defendants have a certain time to reply thereafter, which, of course, would take additional time. I am wondering if you want to invoke that rule or whether, in view of the fact that these two issues are so clear, and the testimony is clear in the minds of all of us, whether you would be willing or feel that you would prefer to proceed without waiting to receive the briefs on the part of the plaintiff. What do you say, Mr. Goodell?

Mr. Goodell: Subject only to this, Your Honor: If counsel chooses to argue points of evidence, I would be a little handicapped to answer them when I didn't know what he was going to argue.

Judge Huxman: You would be given the right for reply brief.

Mr. Goodell: With that exception, I would be perfectly willing to hand mine in at the same time.

Judge Huxman: How much time do you think you need to prepare and file your brief?

[fol. 378] Mr. Goodell: I think a week we can do it in.

Judge Huxman: Well, no need of rushing you to that extent.

Mr. Goodell: Ten days.

Judge Huxman: What do plaintiffs—of course, you have done a lot of work; you have practically got your material assembled on the law, naturally. How long does plaintiff feel that you need to prepare and file your brief?

Mr. Carter: Well, Your Honor, we could, of course, do it within a week, but we would like to have, say, a week from next Monday, which would give us about ten days.

Judge Huxman: Well, let's give the parties—do you want to wait in the preparation of your brief until you receive the record? Of course it will take approximately ten days to get the record. I presume each side will want a record, because, irrespective of the outcome of this litigation, it's headed for the Supreme Court anyway. Do you prefer to wait with your brief until you have a copy of the record? What do you say?

Mr. Goodell: That depends on the turn it takes. As I understand counsel, you are relying now entirely on the question of segregation in itself is discriminatory.

[fol. 379] Mr. Carter: We are relying—of course we are relying on that. I think, Your Honor, that we would not need the record. I think we have our testimony in mind that has been presented.

Mr. Goodell: If that is your point, of course, then——

Judge Huxman: Mr. Goodell, I do not understand the attorneys for plaintiff waive the one point and rely on the other alone.

Mr. Goodell: I——

Judge Huxman: I understand from what they have said they practically indicate they do not lean too heavily on this discrimination in the facilities which are furnished.

BLEED THROUGH

How much time from today does plaintiff want to file their brief, assuming the record will be ready for you in ten days. We will put it that way. How much time do you want from today?

Mr. Carter: We would like to have ten days, Your Honor.

Judge Huxman: We will give you fifteen days. You understand what I asked was assuming that it will take ten days from now to get the record, how much time from now do you want to file your brief? If you want ten days after the record is furnished, you may take twenty days, of [fol. 380] course, from now.

Mr. Goodell: The time, Your Honor, while I am on that subject——

Mr. Carter: Fifteen days will be ample.

Mr. Goodell: If it's going to be appealed, and I think it will be perhaps, either way this decision goes, the time lag would be such that we couldn't have a determination, I don't believe, by September in the appellate court.

Judge Huxman: Of course there are these factors: Judge Mellott and Judge Hill, both, have heavy schedules left and myself, my schedule isn't as heavy as theirs is for the remaining portion of the summer, but if we defer this matter too long, it runs into the fall when our new terms of court take place, and then it would be difficult for any of us to devote our time to it. We don't want to cut the parties short, but, on the other hand, there is no need of granting more time than you need for the preparation.

Mr. Goodell: It seems to me if he is going to go into evidence, it's pretty awkward to write a brief about evidentiary matters without having a transcript, and it's not satisfactory.

Judge Huxman: We will give you twenty days from today for the filing of your brief, and the reporter has told us [fol. 381] it would be about a week for the preparation of the record so, in any event, if you wanted the record, you will have ten or twelve days, and I will say this: If your briefs don't get in on the twentieth day, you will not be out of court.

Mr. Goodell: That will be satisfactory.

Judge Huxman: Are the parties going to order a copy of the record, each of you; I presume that is your intention.

Mr. Goodell: Yes, we will.

Mr. Carter: Yes, sir.

Judge Huxman: All right.

Mr. Goodell: Your Honor, do I understand we are given the privilege of a reply brief if we desire.

Judge Hill: Certainly.

Judge Huxman: Now, there is one other suggestion that the Court has in mind that you could be very helpful to the Court, and that may take a little additional time; that when you file your brief, to go with it each side file suggested findings or requested findings of fact, on the theory that you are going to prevail in the lawsuit, and conclusions of law.

Judge Mellott: We are required to make them under Rule 52.

Judge Huxman: Yes. We must make them, of course, and [fol. 382] it will be helpful to the Court if we had in mind when we come to consider this case, the idea and the theories of both sides as to the findings of fact; if we have both of them, then we will make our own findings, of course.

You also understand that there are three of us, that we all live in separate cities and if you would file your briefs in triplicate so that each judge can have a copy of the brief, it will expedite matters.

One thing I would like to inquire of my two associates of the district bench, what is your practice with regard to requiring printed or typewritten briefs in cases such as these? Of course in the Circuit Court, as you know, briefs must be printed, but my associates tell me that typewritten briefs are the practice here so that will be the practice in this case.

Judge Mellott: Use some good carbon paper because carbons are hard to read.

Mr. Goodell: We will do that.

Judge Huxman: Judge Hill makes this suggestion, which I have found valuable in my work on the appellate bench: If, when you prepare and submit a requested finding of fact, if you will alongside of it have the page of the record that you claim sustains that request, it will save us a tremendous amount of work; otherwise we have to go [fol. 383] through the whole record to see whether there is any warrant in the record for that request. So, if you will do that, that will help the Court.

Judge Mellott: I would like to have you get copies of the court's rules of practice, which are printed, and that will call your attention to the way we want the brief prepared; give us a table of cases and your citations.

Judge Huxman: My associates are more familiar with those rules than I am. It's their court, and they know what the practice is.

Now, I suppose Judge Mellott and Judge Hill, that we should make the same order with respect to all of these requests for brief amicus curiae, that they be filed within the same length of time, within twenty days from today; anybody that has appeared here that wants to file a brief as amicus curiae.

Mr. Goodell: Our notion, if it doesn't interfere with the rules of the court, would be to have the other lawyers join with us in a certain section of the brief.

Judge Huxman: Well, I would certainly prefer—frankly, I have never been very much impressed with this amicus curiae theory of the law. There just isn't such a thing anyhow because an amicus curiae has an active interest on [fol. 384] one side or the other of the litigation and if you could get—that is, however, for you defendants to arrange—if you could get all the parties who have entered an appearance amicus curiae to join with you in the brief, it would save a lot of duplication.

Mr. Goodell: That is what I thought.

Judge Huxman: These issues are sharply drawn. There is a certain line of cases, and it's just a question of analyzing and distinguishing those cases, but, however, I doubt whether we could order that—whether we can order amicus curiae to join with you in a brief.

Mr. Goodell: If it's satisfactory, I meant, I think that is what we will do.

Judge Huxman: That would be much simpler. Anything that the parties have to request? The court will be adjourned subject to further call.

(The court then, at 12:15 o'clock p. m., stood adjourned until further call.)

[fol. 386] IN UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

OPINION OF THE COURT—Entered August 3, 1951.

HUXMAN, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the Court.

Chapter 72-1724 of the General Statutes of Kansas, 1949, relating to public schools in cities of the first class, so far as material, authorizes such cities to organize and maintain separate schools for the education of white and colored children in the grades below the high school grades. Pursuant to this authority, the City of Topeka, Kansas, a city of the first class, has established and maintains a segregated system of schools for the first six grades. It has established and maintains in the Topeka School District eighteen schools for white students and four schools for colored students.

The adult plaintiffs instituted this action for themselves, their minor children plaintiffs, and all other persons similarly situated for an interlocutory injunction, a permanent injunction, restraining the enforcement, operation and execution of the state statute and the segregation instituted thereunder by the school authorities of the City of Topeka and for a declaratory judgment declaring unconstitutional the state statute and the segregation set up thereunder by the school authorities of the City of Topeka.

As against the school district of Topeka they contend that the opportunities provided for the infant plaintiffs in the separate all negro schools are inferior to those provided white children in the all white schools; that the respects in which these opportunities are inferior include the physical facilities, curricula, teaching resources, student personnel services as well as all other services. As against both the state and the school district, they contend that apart from all other factors segregation in itself constitutes [fol. 387] an inferiority in educational opportunities offered to negroes and that all of this is in violation of due process guaranteed them by the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution. In their answer both the state and the school district defend the constitutionality of the state law and in addition the school district defends the segregation in its schools instituted thereunder.

We have found as a fact that the physical facilities, the curricula, courses of study, qualification of and quality of teachers, as well as other educational facilities in the two sets of schools are comparable. It is obvious that absolute equality of physical facilities is impossible of attainment in buildings that are erected at different times. So also absolute equality of subjects taught is impossible of maintenance when teachers are permitted to select books of their own choosing to use in teaching in addition to the prescribed courses of study. It is without dispute that the prescribed courses of study are identical in all of the Topeka Schools and that there is no discrimination in this respect. It is also clear in the record that the educational qualifications of the teachers in the colored schools are equal to those in the white schools and that in all other respects the educational facilities and services are comparable. It is obvious from the fact that there are only four colored schools as against eighteen white schools in the Topeka School District, that colored children in many instances are required to travel much greater distances than they would be required to travel could they attend a white school, and are required to travel much greater distances than white children are required to travel. The evidence, however, establishes that the school district transports colored children to and from school free of charge. No such service is furnished to white children. We conclude that in the maintenance and operation of the [fol. 388] schools there is no willful, intentional or substantial discrimination in the matters referred to above between the colored and white schools. In fact, while plaintiffs' attorneys have not abandoned this contention, they did not give it great emphasis in their presentation before the court. They relied primarily upon the contention that segregation in and of itself without more violates their rights guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment.

This contention poses a question not free from difficulty. As a subordinate court in the federal judicial system, we seek the answer to this constitutional question in the decisions of the Supreme Court when it has spoken on the subject and do not substitute our own views for the declared law by the Supreme Court. The difficult question as always is to analyze the decisions and seek to ascertain the trend as revealed by the later decisions.

There are a great number of cases, both federal and state, that have dealt with the many phases of segregation. Since the question involves a construction and interpretation of the federal Constitution and the pronouncements of the Supreme Court, we will consider only those cases by the Supreme Court with respect to segregation in the schools. In the early case of Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537, the Supreme Court said:

> "The object of the amendment was undoubtedly to enforce the absolute equality of the two races before the law, but in the nature of things it could not have been intended to abolish distinctions based upon color, or to enforce social, as distinguished from political equality, or a commingling of the two races upon terms unsatisfactory to either. Laws permitting, and even requiring, their separation in places where they are liable to be brought into contact do not necessarily [fol. 389] imply the inferiority of either race to the other, and have been generally, if not universally, recognized as within the competency of the state legislatures in the exercise of their police power. The most common instance of this is connected with the establishment of separate schools for white and colored children, which has been held to be a valid exercise of the legislative power even by courts of States where the political rights of the colored race have been longest and most earnestly enforced."

It is true as contended by plaintiffs that the Plessy case involved transportation and that the above quoted statement relating to schools was not essential to the decision of the question before the court and was therefore somewhat in the nature of dicta. But that the statement is considered more than dicta is evidenced by the treatment accorded it by those seeking to strike down segregation as well as by statements in subsequent decisions of the Supreme Court. On numerous occasions the Supreme Court has been asked to overrule the Plessy case. This the Supreme Court has refused to do, on the sole ground that a decision of the question was not necessary to a disposal of the controversy presented. In the late case of Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629, the Supreme Court again refused to review the Plessy case. The Court said:

> "Nor need we reach petitioner's contention that Plessy v. Ferguson should be reexamined in the light of contemporary knowledge respecting the purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment and the effects of racial segregation."

Gong Lum v. Rice, 275 U. S. 78, was a grade school segregation case. It involved the segregation law of Mississippi. Gong Lum was a Chinese child and, because of color, was required to attend the separate schools provided for colored children. The opinion of the court assumes that the educational facilities in the colored schools were adequate and equal to those of the white schools. Thus the court said: "The question here is whether a Chinese citizen of the [fol. 390] United States is denied equal protection of the laws when he is classed among the colored races and furnished facilities for education equal to that offered to all, whether white, brown, yellow or black." In addition to numerous state decisions on the subject, the Supreme Court in support of its conclusions cited Plessy v. Ferguson, supra. The Court also pointed out that the question was the same no matter what the color of the class that was required to attend separate schools. Thus the Court said: "Most of the cases cited arose, it is true, over the establishment of separate schools as between white pupils and black pupils, but we cannot think that the question is any different or that any different result can be reached, assuming the cases above cited to be rightly decided, where the issue is as between white pupils and the pupils of the yellow race." The court held that the question of segregation was within the discretion of the state in regulating its public schools and did not conflict with the Fourteenth Amendment.

It is vigorously argued and not without some basis therefor that the later decisions of the Supreme Court in McLaurin v. Oklahoma, 339 U. S. 637, and Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629, show a trend away from the Plessy and Lum cases. McLaurin v. Oklahoma arose under the segregation laws of Oklahoma. McLaurin, a colored student, applied for admission to the University of Oklahoma in order to pursue studies leading to a doctorate degree in education. He was denied admission solely because he was a negro. After litigation in the courts, which need not be reviewed herein, the legislature amended the statute permitting the admission of colored students to institutions of higher learning attended by white students, but providing that such instruction should be given on a segregated basis; that the instruction be given in separate class rooms or at separate times. In compliance with this statute McLaurin [fol. 391] was admitted to the university but was required to sit at a separate desk in the ante room adjoining the class room; to sit at a designated desk on the mezzanine floor of the library; and to sit at a designated table and eat at a different time from the other students in the school cafeteria. These restrictions were held to violate his rights under the federal Constitution. The Supreme Court held that such treatment handicapped the student in his pursuit of effective graduate instruction.[1]

[1] The court said: "Our society grows increasingly complex, and our need for trained leaders increases correspondingly. Appellant's case represents, perhaps, the epitome of that need, for he is attempting to obtain an

BLEED THROUGH

In Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629, petitioner, a colored student, filed an application for admission to the University of Texas Law School. His application was rejected solely on the ground that he was a negro. In its opinion the Supreme Court stressed the educational benefits from commingling with white students. The court concluded by stating: "We cannot conclude that the education offered petitioner in a separate school is substantially equal to that which he would receive if admitted to the University of Texas Law School." If segregation within a school as in the McLaurin case is a denial of due process, it is difficult to see why segregation in separate schools would not result [fol. 392] in the same denial. Or if the denial of the right to commingle with the majority group in higher institutions of learning as in the Sweatt case and gain the educational advantages resulting therefrom, is lack of due process, it is difficult to see why such denial would not result in the same lack of due process if practiced in the lower grades.

It must however be remembered that in both of these cases the Supreme Court made it clear that it was confining itself to answering the one specific question, namely: "To what extent does the equal protection clause limit the advanced degree in education, to become, by definition, a leader and trainer of others. Those who will come under this guidance and influence must be directly affected by the education he received. Their own education and development will necessarily suffer to the extent that his training is unequal to that of his classmates. State imposed restrictions which produce such inequalities cannot be sustained."

"It may be argued that appellant will be in no better position when these restrictions are removed, for he may still be set apart by his fellow students. This we think irrelevant. There is a vast difference—a Constitutional difference—between restrictions imposed by the state which prohibit the intellectual commingling of students, and the refusal of individuals to commingle where the state presents no such bar. * * * having been admitted to a state supported graduate school, [he] must receive the same treatment at the hands of the state as students of other races."

power of a state to distinguish between students of different races in professional and graduate education in a state university?", and that the Supreme Court refused to review the Plessy case because that question was not essential to a decision of the controversy in the case.

We are accordingly of the view that the Plessy and Lum cases, supra, have not been overruled and that they still presently are authority for the maintenance of a segregated school system in the lower grades.

The prayer for relief will be denied and judgment will be entered for defendants for costs.

[fol. 393] In United States District Court

Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law—Entered August 3, 1951.

Findings of Fact

I

This is a class action in which plaintiffs seek a decree, declaring Section 72-1724 of the General Statutes of Kansas 1949 to be unconstitutional, insofar as it empowers the Board of Education of the City of Topeka "to organize and maintain separate schools for the education of white and colored children" and an injunction restraining the enforcement, operation and execution of that portion of the statute and of the segregation instituted thereunder by the School Board.

II

This suit arises under the Constitution of the United States and involves more than $3,000 exclusive of interest and costs. It is also a civil action to redress an alleged deprivation, under color of State law, of a right, privilege or immunity secured by the Constitution of the United States providing for an equal rights of citizens and to have the court declare the rights and other legal relations of the interested parties. The Court has jurisdiction of the subject matter and of the parties to the action.

BLEED THROUGH

III

Pursuant to statutory authority contained in Section 72-1724 of the General Statutes of Kansas 1949, the City of Topeka, Kansas, a city of the first class, has established and maintains a segregated system of schools for the first six grades. It has established and maintains in the Topeka School District, eighteen schools for white children and four [fol. 394] for colored children, the latter being located in neighborhoods where the population is predominantly colored. The City of Topeka is one school district. The colored children may attend any one of the four schools established for them, the choice being made either by the children or by their parents.

IV

There is no material difference in the physical facilities in the colored schools and in the white schools and such facilities in the colored schools are not inferior in any material respects to those in the white schools.

V

The educational qualifications of the teachers and the quality of instruction in the colored schools are not inferior to and are comparable to those of the white schools.

VI

The courses of study prescribed by the State law are taught in both the colored schools and in the white schools. The prescribed courses of study are identical in both classes of schools.

VII

Transportation to and from school is furnished colored children in the segregated schools without cost to the children or to their parents. No such transportation is furnished to the white children in the segregated schools.

[fol. 395] VIII

Segregation of white and colored children in public schools has a detrimental effect upon the colored children.

The impact is greater when it has the sanction of the law; for the policy of separating the races is usually interpreted as denoting the inferiority of the negro group. A sense of inferiority affects the motivation of a child to learn. Segregation with the sanction of law, therefore, has a tendency to retard the educational and mental development of negro children and to deprive them of some of the benefits they would receive in a racial integrated school system.

IX

The court finds as facts the stipulated facts and those agreed upon by counsel at the pre-trial and during the course of the trial.

Conclusions of Law

I

This court has jurisdiction of the subject matter and of the parties to the action.[1]

II

We conclude that no discrimination is practiced against plaintiffs in the colored schools set apart for them because of the nature of the physical characteristics of the buildings, the equipment, the curricula, quality of instructors and [fol. 396] instruction or school services furnished and that they are denied no constitutional rights or privileges by reason of any of these matters.

III

Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537, and Gong Lum v. Rice, 275 U. S. 78 upholds the constitutionality of a legally segregated school system in the lower grades and no denial of due process results from the maintenance of such a segregated system of schools absent discrimination in the maintenance of the segregated schools. We conclude that the above cited cases have not been overruled by the later cases of McLaurin v. Oklahoma, 339 U. S. 637, and Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629.

IV

The only question in the case under the record is whether legal segregation in and of itself without more constitutes denial of due process. We are of the view that under the above decisions of the Supreme Court the answer must be in the negative. We accordingly conclude that plaintiffs have suffered no denial of due process by virtue of the manner in which the segregated school system of Topeka, Kansas, is being operated. The relief sought is therefore denied. Judgment will be entered for defendants for costs.

Degree—Entered August 3, 1951.

Now on this 3rd day of August, 1951 this cause comes regularly on for hearing before the undersigned Judges, constituting a three-judge court, duly convened pursuant to the provisions of Title 28 U. S. C. 2281 and 2284.

The Court has heretofore filed its Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law together with an opinion and has held as a matter of law that the plaintiffs have failed to prove they are entitled to the relief demanded.

Now, therefore, it is by the court, considered, ordered, adjudged and decreed that judgment be and it hereby is entered in favor of the defendants.

The District Court erred:

1. In refusing to grant plaintiffs' application for a temporary and permanent injunction restraining the defendants from acting pursuant to Chapter 72-1724 of the General Statutes of Kansas under which they are maintaining separate public elementary schools through the first six grades for Negro children solely because of their race and color.

2. In refusing to hold that the State of Kansas is without authority to promulgate Chapter 72-1724 of the General Statutes of Kansas in that such statute constitutes a classification based upon race and color which is violative of the Constitution of the United States.

3. In refusing to enter judgment in favor of plaintiffs, after the court found that plaintiffs suffered serious harm and detriment in being required to attend segregated elementary schools in the City of Topeka, and were deprived thereby of benefits they would have received in a racially integrated school system.

Wherefore, plaintiffs pray that the final decree of the [fol. 402] District Court be reversed, and for such other relief as the Court may deem fit and proper.

APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF KANSAS

STATEMENT AS TO JURISDICTION

In compliance with Rule 12 of the Rules of the Supreme Court of the United States, as amended, plaintiffs-appellants submit herewith their statement particularly disclosing the basis upon which the Supreme Court has jurisdiction on appeal to review the judgment of the district court entered in this cause.

Opinion Below

The opinion of the United States District Court for the District of Kansas is not yet reported. A copy of the opinion, findings of fact, conclusions of law and final decree are attached hereto as Appendix A.

Jurisdiction

The judgment of the district court was entered on August 3, 1951. A petition for appeal is presented to the District Court herewith, to wit, on September 28, 1951. The jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to review this decision by direct appeal is conferred by Title 28, United States Code, Sections 1253 and 2101(b). The following decisions sustain the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to review the judgment on direct appeal in this case: McLaurin v. Board of Regents, 339 U. S. 637; Wilson v. Board of Supervisors, — U. S. —, 94 L. ed. (Ad. Op.) 200.

Questions Presented

1. Whether Chapter 72-1724 of the General Statutes of Kansas, 1949, is unconstitutional in that it gives to defendants-appellees the power to organize and maintain separate public elementary schools for the education of white and colored children in the City of Topeka, Kansas.

2. Whether after having shown that the maintenance of racially segregated elementary schools in Topeka, pursuant to Chapter 72-1724 of the General Statutes of Kansas, 1949, is harmful and deprives them of the benefits they would receive under a racially integrated school system, plaintiffs-appellants are necessarily entitled to the relief prayed for in their complaint.

Statutes Involved

Chapter 72-1724 of the General Statutes of Kansas, 1949, as set forth in Appendix B attached hereto.

Statement

Appellants are here seeking to enjoin appellees from maintaining separate public elementary schools for Negro and white pupils in the City of Topeka, pursuant to authority conferred by Chapter 72-1724 of the General Statutes of Kansas, 1949. The asserted right to injunctive relief is based upon the unconstitutionality of Chapter 72-1724, in that the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution strips the state of power to either authorize or require the maintenance of racially segregated public schools. A district court of three judges was convened, as provided in Title 28, United States Code, Sections 2281 and 2284, and on June 25, 26, 1951 a hearing on the merits took place.

BLEED THROUGH

The evidence there presented disclosed that the City of Topeka is divided into eighteen territories for school purposes. One elementary school is maintained by appellees in each of these eighteen territories for the exclusive use of white children, and in addition four separate elementary schools are maintained for the exclusive use of Negro children. Negro children must attend one of the four segregated schools maintained for them, even though they may live considerably closer to one of the schools maintained for white children. Segregation is enforced only in elementary schools which in Topeka ends with the completion of the sixth grade. After the sixth grade a student enters junior high school, which along with senior high schools, is operated as part of a racially integrated school system.

With respect to teacher qualifications, class size, teacher-pupil load and courses prescribed, there is little material difference between the eighteen schools for white children and the four schools for colored children. Appellants introduced evidence to show, however, that on the average the Negro schools were older, of lower insured value per classroom and had inferior library holdings. Evidence was also introduced to show that Negro children, who lived close to Gage, State Street and Oakland schools, which were new, luxurious, modern educational plants maintained for white children, were required, nonetheless, to travel a considerable distance in order to attend one of the Negro schools which were inferior to these in terms of physical facilities. Forty-five percent of the white children attended schools which were newer than the newest Negro school, and only 14% attended schools older than the oldest Negro school. These differences in physical facilities were brought out in the testimony of Dr. Hugh Speer and Dr. James Buchanan who had made a survey of the schools on behalf of appellants.

Seven additional expert witnesses testified on behalf of appellants. In substance their testimony was that racial segregation for school purposes is unreasonable and arbitrary; that Negro children are relegated to an inferior status by virtue of being required to attend segregated schools, are confused and made personally insecure, and that the legally enforced isolation of Negro children in segregated public schools made it impossible for them to receive educational opportunities equal to those presently available to all other students.

Although the court below, in its findings of fact, found no material difference between the Negro and white schools with respect to physical facilities, it found that the segregation complained of has a detrimental effect upon colored children and that the "impact is greater when it has the sanction of law; for the policy of separating the races is usually interpreted as denoting the inferiority of the Negro group. A sense of inferiority affects the motivation of a child to learn. Segregation with the sanction of law, therefore, has a tendency to retard the educational and mental development of Negro children, and to deprive them of some of the benefits they would receive in a racially integrated school system."

The district court, on August 3, 1951, entered a final order and decree denying appellants' injunctive relief on the grounds that Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537 and Gong Lum v. Rice, 275 U. S. 78 upheld the constitutionality of the statute in question and that these cases had not been overruled by McLaurin v. Board of Regents, 339 U. S. 637 and Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629. Appellants on direct appeal are now seeking a review of this judgment by the Supreme Court of the United States.

BLEED THROUGH

The Questions Are Substantial

The issues involved in this appeal are similar to those raised in Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629; McLaurin v. Board of Regents, 339 U. S. 637 and in Briggs v. Elliott, now pending before the United States Supreme Court on direct appeal from the United States District Court for the Eastern District of South Carolina. The issues are of vital importance especially at this time because the preservation of strong democratic institutions necessarily depends upon the intelligence and enlightenment of our citizenry. When the educational and mental development of a portion of our population is retarded by state practices which violate the Constitution, it becomes impossible to fully muster the capabilities and energies of the country to meet whatever crises lie ahead.

1. We are here concerned with state power to impose racial segregation in the broad field of public education at the elementary school level. In the McLaurin and Sweatt cases the United States Supreme Court dealt with the permissible limits of such state power at the professional and graduate school level. The issues in this appeal, however, raise questions of a greater importance and of more basic concern then the question of racial segregation in graduate and professional schools.

The sine qua non of education in a democratic society is the teaching of a belief in and loyalty to democratic ideals.

It is at the elementary or primary educational level that children, along with their acquisition of facts and figures, integrate and formulate basic ideas and attitudes about the society in which they live. When these early attitudes are born and fashioned within a segregated educational framework, students of both the majority and minority groups are not only limited in a full and complete interchange of ideas and responses, but are confronted and influenced by value judgments, sanctioned by their society which establishes qualitative distinctions on the basis of race. Education cannot be separated from the social environment in which the child lives. He cannot attend separate schools and learn the meaning of equality.[1]

One eminent authority in the field of educational segregration has summed up the role of the separate Negro school as follows:

> "The separate school is an instrument of social policy and a symbol of inferior status."[2]

Segregated education, particularly at the elementary level, where the emotional aspects of learning are inextricably tied up with the learning process itself, must and does have a definite and deleterious effect upon the Negro child.[3] It is particularly true that when segregation exists at the elementary level it is hard to distinguish between fact and fiction—the fiction, in this instance, being an arbitrary classification on the basis of race. A recent study of the development of attitudes towards Negroes concludes that prejudice begins early in the life span and develops gradually, and that "attitudes towards Negroes are now chiefly determined not by contact with Negroes, but by contact with prevalent attitudes toward Negroes."[4]

Appellants have demonstrated to the satisfaction of the court below that segregation at the elementary school level prejudices the Negro child in his pursuit of knowledge. It is common knowledge that the number of persons attending public elementary schools is far greater than that attending public graduate and professional schools. It logically follows, therefore, that the injuries which segregation causes in the elementary grades is more far reaching and devastating and affects more people than is the case with respect to graduate and professional education. It affects young children by creating prejudicial attitudes which by virtue of their extreme youth they can in no way identify.[5] Since elementary education is absorbed during the formative years of a child's life, it assumes a peculiar and more important role than education at any other level. It is true that most professions and occupational fields require skills and information that can only be acquired through higher and professional education, but it is not the skill or professional knowledge alone that makes a good doctor, lawyer, engineer, or teacher.[6] It is an integrated, intelligent and open-minded personality that can best benefit from education at any level. It is hard, if not impossible, to build a durable building on a weak framework. The educational process is cumulative in nature, a person's "knowledge" or "education" can never be separated from the total personality. If a young student can learn in a democracy and at the same time learn the significance of democracy, he must be able to do so freely—unhampered by such arbitrary and limiting factors as distinctions on the basis of race.[7] Negro children cannot be afforded the opportunity to develop fully their intelligence and their mental capabilities if their training is circumscribed and their development stunted by state practices which, at the very outset of their search for education, places them at a disadvantage with children belonging to other racial groups.

2. Having established that racial segregation in the public elementary schools of Topeka had a detrimental effect upon appellants and other Negro students, affected their motivation to learn, their educational and mental development, and deprived them of benefits which would have been forthcoming in a racially integrated school system, appellants were entitled to the relief prayed for in their complaint under the rationale of the Sweatt and McLaurin cases. In those cases the United States Supreme Court found that equal educational opportunities in law and in graduate training could not be obtained in a racially segregated educational system.

One of the chief considerations, which led the court to conclude that equal educational opportunities were not offered at the segregated Negro law school in the Sweatt case, was that members of racial groups comprising 85% of the population of Texas were excluded from its student body. The court said, at page 634:

> ". . . With such a substantial and significant segment of the population excluded, we cannot conclude that the education offered petitioner is substantially equal to that he would receive if admitted to the University of Texas law school."

Thus, without regard to physical facilities, the opinion in the Sweatt case means that equal educational opportunities in law cannot be afforded a Negro applicant where he is required to take his training in isolation from law students who are representative of a "substantial and significant segment of the population." It must have been felt in that case, we submit, that a student who obtains an education under circumstances such as to require daily contact and competition with members of racial groups comprising the dominant and more advantaged majority would necessarily receive a better education than a student who must get his training under conditions which would limit him to daily contact and competition from members of a single racial group comprising the state's most disadvantaged minority.

In the McLaurin case, although no question of the inequality in physical facilities could have been raised, the court found the state, in requiring McLaurin to sit apart from other students in the classrooms, cafeteria and library solely because of race, handicapped him in his pursuit of effective graduate instruction. "Such restrictions," said the court at page 641, "impair and inhibit his ability to study, to engage in discussions and to exchange views with other students and, in general, to learn his profession."

We take these two decisions to mean that any form of state imposed racial segregation at the graduate and professional school levels of state universities contravenes the Fourteenth Amendment because such restrictions handicap the applicant in his pursuit of knowledge and necessarily deprive him of equal educational opportunities. This analysis is confirmed by Wilson v. Board of Supervisors, supra, and McKissick v. Carmichael, 187 F. 2d 949 (CCA 4th 1951) cert. den. — U.S. —, June 4, 1951.

In the McLaurin case, moreover, the court recognized that not only would their decision affect McLaurin personally but that the quality of his education had more far-reaching implications. The court said, at page 641, that as a trainer of others,

> "[t]hose who will come under his guidance and influence must be directly affected by the education he receives. Their own education and development will necessarily suffer to the extent that his training is unequal to that of his classmates."

Thus the court was not only concerned with the question of McLaurin's personal right to equal educational opportunities but was aware that his inferior training would necessarily mean inferior training for his students. Now, in this case, we are directly confronted with the question with which the Court was indirectly concerned in the McLaurin case.

At the outset of the opinion in the Sweatt case, at page 631, it was made clear that the court was deciding only the question of the power of the state to distinguish between students of different races in professional and graduate education of state universities. This statement meant no more than that the court was deciding the constitutional question within the narrowest limits essential to the disposition of the case at hand. This is not new but normal Supreme Court procedure, Rescue Army v. Municipal Court, 331 U. S. 549, 568-575, and cases cited. The assertion by the Court that it was following this practice and hence deciding only the constitutionality of state-imposed segregation at the graduate and professional school levels cannot properly be interpreted to mean that segregation at the elementary school level is thereby validated. Nor did the Court's refusal to reexamine Plessy v. Ferguson infer that the "separate but equal" doctrine of that case was approved as the yardstick to determine constitutionality of racial segregation in areas other than professional and graduate education. We take this refusal to mean merely that the Court had found segregation unconstitutional at the graduate and professional school levels and, therefore, deemed it unnecessary to meet the question of whether Plessy v. Ferguson had general application. The Court, without first having facts before it, was in no position to say that segregation in areas other than graduate and professional education was a denial of equal protection of the laws. Where the facts show such denial, the Court, we submit, would strike down segregation as was done in the McLaurin and Sweatt cases.

Attention is directed to Rice v. Arnold, 340 U. S. 848, dec. Oct. 17, 1950. That case was reversed and remanded to the Supreme Court of Florida for reexamination in the light of the Sweatt and McLaurin cases. It is true that this case may not necessarily mean that racial segregation on public golf courses is considered by the Supreme Court as a denial of equal protection of the laws. Rice v. Arnold does conclusively indicate, we submit, that the Court's statement in the Sweatt case with respect to Plessy v. Ferguson was not intended to imply that the "separate but equal" formula was to be used to dispose of questions involving racial seggation except for graduate and professional schools. Moreover, Rice v. Arnold indicates that the constitutionality of state sanctioned racial segregation must now be determined by the courts on the basis of an inquiry into its actual effect as was done in the McLaurin and Sweatt cases. Here the district court made such an inquiry and concluded that the effect of racial segregation in this case was as pernicious as it had been found to be in the McLaurin and Sweatt cases. Having determined, in fact, that equal educational opportunities were not afforded in the segregated schools of Topeka, the court, in the light of the McLaurin and Sweatt cases was obligated to hold that Chapter 72-1724 was unconstitutional and that appellees could not continue to maintain separate elementary schools for Negroes and whites.

3. Chapter 72-1724 of General Statutes of Kansas, 1949, is clearly an arbitrary and unreasonable exercise of state power in violation of the guarantees of the Fourteenth Amendment for the following reasons:

A. This statute authorizes governmental classifications and distinctions based upon race for school purposes. In order for such classifications and distinctions to conform with the requirements of the Federal Constitution, they must be based upon a real or substantial difference which has pertinence to a legitimate legislative objective. Dominion Hotel v. Arizona, 294 U. S. 265; Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U. S. 535. This statute cannot be sustained under this constitutional yardstick. Certainly, the statute cannot be sustained if based upon race alone. See Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U. S. 81, 100; Korematsu v. United States, 323 U. S. 214, 216; Takahashi v. Fish and Game Commission, 334 U. S. 410, 420; Oyama v. California, 332 U. S. 633, 640; Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U. S. 1, 21, 23.

There is no difference between Negro children and white chilren with respect to ability to learn or to absorb knowledge based upon the racial factor alone. Whatever differences exist in this regard are individual and not racial. This is an uncontroverted scientific fact. See: Testimony of Horace B. English. See also: Rose, America Divided: Minority Group Relations in the United States (1948);

BLEED THROUGH

Montague, Man's Most Dangerous Myth—The Black & White of Rejections for Military Service, 5 (1944) at 29; Klineberg, Race Differences, 343 (1935). Thus, the statute cannot be sustained if based upon a mistaken assumption that such racial differences do in fact exist.

This statute authorizes racial segregation in the elementary grades only. In Topeka, elementary school ends with completion of the sixth grade. Thereafter, at the junior and senior high school level, the Topeka school system is racially integrated. Moreover, the segregation authorized can only be imposed in cities of the first class. Thus, whatever the basis for the classification, about which appellants can only wildly speculate, if not based upon race or ability to learn and absorb knowledge, it must be some factor which is: (1) present in the first six grades of public schools in Kansas, but not present thereafter, and (2) it must be present in some communities in Kansas, but not in others. This is impossible. In short, the statute cannot be sustained under the constitutional formula, as being based on a real and substantial difference which has pertinence to a legitimate legislative objective to which state classifications and distinctions must adhere.

B. This statute cannot be said to sustain an important state interest particularly in view of the fact that Kansas has a history of freedom and equality, and legally enforced segregation is contrary to its deep-rooted traditions and customs.

The General Statutes of Kansas, Annotated, (Corrick) 1949, outlaw discrimination in a wide variety of circumstances.[8] Section 76-307, which applies to schools of arts, engineering, pharmacy, law and medicine, states:

> "No person shall be debarred from membership of the university on account of age, race, sex, or religion."

[8] The statutes cited herein are set forth in Appendix B hereto.

Section 12-713, dealing with planning, zoning and city planning commissions, provided:

> "Nothing herein contained shall be construed as authorizing the governing body to discriminate against any person by reason of race or color."

Section 21-2424 makes it a misdemeanor punishable by a fine of $10 to $10,000 and makes the misdemeanant liable to a suit for damages, for any person to make a distinction on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude in a state university, college or other school of public instruction; in a hotel, boarding house, place of entertainment or amusement for which a license is required by municipal authorities of the state; or in a steamboat, railroad, stagecoach, omnibus, streetcar, or other means of public carriage.

Section 21-2461 provides that no citizen of the United States shall be refused employment in any capacity on the ground of race or color nor be discriminated against in any manner in connection with any public work by or on behalf of the state or any governmental subdivision thereof.

Section 21-2462 provides that the act of which Section 21-2461 is a part shall be included in all contracts made by governmental subdivisions which involve the employment of laborers and shall apply to all contractors and subcontractors.

Section 21-2463 provides that any officer violating the latter two sections shall be punishable by a fine of $50-$1,000 and by imprisonment of not more than six months or both.

House Joint Resolution No. 1 of the House of Representatives of the State of Kansas [L. 1949, Ch. 289, p. 253] states that:

BLEED THROUGH

> ". . . The state of Kansas is traditionally and historically opposed to discrimination against any of its citizens in employment; and
>
> ". . . It is the public policy of this state that all of the citizens of this state are entitled to work without restrictions or limitations based on race, religion, creed or national origin; . . ."

The final and most telling statutory provision in the laws of the State of Kansas is the very statute here under attack, which, by its very terms, recognizes that the distinction herein practiced is what the Fourteenth Amendment was designed to destroy: discrimination. That statute states:

> "No discrimination on account of color shall be made in high schools except as provided herein."

By plain meaning and context, it is clear that this statute recognized that segregation is discrimination.

Conclusion

The importance of the issues raised, the mistaken notion of the district court that Plessy v. Ferguson and Gong Lum v. Rice required them to sustain the constitutionality of Chapter 72-1724 of the General Statutes of Kansas, 1949, in spite of their own findings that segregated schools in Topeka were detrimental to appellants and to Negro children generally, the arbitrary and unreasonable nature of the statute and the utter lack of any real state interest in maintaining racially segregated elementary schools in Kansas where legally enforced racial segregation is an anomaly, all present compelling reasons which warrant review of this judgment on appeal by the United States Supreme Court.

OPINION OF THE COURT

HUXMAN, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the Court.

Chapter 72-1724 of the General Statutes of Kansas, 1949, relating to public schools in cities of the first class, so far as material, authorizes such cities to organize and maintain separate schools for the education of white and colored children in the grades below the high school grades. Pursuant to this authority, the City of Topeka, Kansas, a city of the first class, has established and maintains a segregated system of schools for the first six grades. It has established and maintains in the Topeka School District eighteen schools for white students and four schools for colored students.

The adult plaintiffs instituted this action for themselves, their minor children plaintiffs, and all other persons similarly situated for an interlocutory injunction, a permanent injunction, restraining the enforcement, operation and execution of the state statute and the segregation instituted thereunder by the school authorities of the City of Topeka and for a declaratory judgment declaring unconstitutional the state statute and the segregation set up thereunder by the school authorities of the City of Topeka.

As against the school district of Topeka they contend that the opportunities provided for the infant plaintiffs in the separate all negro schools are inferior to those provided white children in the all white schools; that the respects in which these opportunities are inferior include the physical facilities, curricula, teaching resources, student personnel services as well as all other services. As against both the state and the school district, they contend that apart from all other factors segregation in itself constitutes an inferiority in educational opportunities offered to negroes and that all of this is in violation of due process guaranteed them by the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution. In their answer both the state and the school district defend the constitutionality of the state law and in addition the school district defends the segregation in its schools instituted thereunder.

We have found as a fact that the physical facilities, the curricula, courses of study, qualification of and quality of teachers, as well as other educational facilities in the two sets of schools are comparable. It is obvious that absolute equality of physical facilities is impossible of attainment in buildings that are erected at different times. So also absolute equality of subjects taught is impossible of maintenance when teachers are permitted to select books of their own choosing to use in teaching in addition to the prescribed courses of study. It is without dispute that the prescribed courses of study are identical in all of the Topeka Schools and that there is no discrimination in this respect. It is also clear in the record that the educational qualifications of the teachers in the colored schools are equal to those in the white schools and that in all other respects the educational facilities and services are comparable. It is obvious from the fact that there are only four colored schools as against eighteen white schools in the Topeka School District, that colored children in many instances are required to travel much greater distances than they would be required to travel could they attend a white school, and are required to travel much greater distances than white children are required to travel. The evidence, however, establishes that the school district transports colored children to and from school free of charge. No such service is furnished to white children. We conclude that in the maintenance and operation of the schools there is no willful, intentional or substantial discrimination in the matters referred to above between the colored and white schools. In fact, while plaintiffs' attorneys have not abandoned this contention, they did not give it great emphasis in their presentation before the court. They relied primarily upon the contention that segregation in and of itself without more violates their rights guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment.

This contention poses a question not free from difficulty. As a subordinate court in the federal judicial system, we seek the answer to this constitutional question in the decisions of the Supreme Court when it has spoken on the subject and do not substitute our own views for the declared law by the Supreme Court. The difficult question as always is to analyze the decisions and seek to ascertain the trend as revealed by the later decisions.

There are a great number of cases, both federal and state, that have dealt with the many phases of segregation. Since the question involves a construction and interpretation of the federal Constitution and the pronouncements of the Supreme Court, we will consider only those cases by the Supreme Court with respect to segregation in the schools. In the early case of Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537, the Supreme Court said:

> "The object of the amendment was undoubtedly to enforce the absolute equality of the two races before the law, but in the nature of things it could not have been intended to abolish distinctions based upon color, or to enforce social, as distinguished from political equality, or a commingling of the two races upon terms unsatisfactory to either. Laws permitting, and even requiring, their separation in places where they are liable to brought into contact do not necessarily imply the inferiority of either race to the other, and have been generally, if not universally, recognized as within the competency of the state legislatures in the exercise of their police power. The most common instance of this is connected with the establishment of separate schools for white and colored children, which has been held to be a valid exercise of the legislative power even by courts of States where the political rights of the colored race have been longest and most earnestly enforced."

It is true as contended by plaintiffs that the Plessy case involved transportation and that the above quoted statement relating to schools was not essential to the decision of the question before the court and was therefore somewhat in the nature of dicta. But that the statement is considered more than dicta is evidenced by the treatment accorded it by those seeking to strike down segregation as well as by statements in subsequent decisions of the Supreme Court. On numerous occasions the Supreme Court has been asked to overrule the Plessy case. This the Supreme Court has refused to do, on the sole ground that a decision of the question was not necessary to a disposal of the controversy presented. In the late case of Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629, the Supreme Court again refused to review the Plessy case. The Court said:

> "Nor need we reach petitioner's contention that Plessy v. Ferguson should be reexamined in the light of contemporary knowledge respecting the purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment and the effects of racial segregation."

Gong Lum v. Rice, 275 U. S. 78, was a grade school segregation case. It involved the segregation law of Mississippi. Gong Lum was a Chinese child and, because of color, was required to attend the separate schools provided for colored children. The opinion of the court assumes that the educational facilities in the colored schools were adequate and equal to those of the white schools. Thus the court said: "The question here is whether a Chinese citizen of the United States is denied equal protection of the laws when he is classed among the colored races and furnished facilities for education equal to that offered to all, whether white, brown, yellow or black." In addition to numerous state decisions on the subject, the Supreme Court in support of its conclusions cited Plessy v. Ferguson, supra. The Court also pointed out that the question was the same no matter what the color of the class that was required to attend separate schools. Thus the Court said: Most of the cases cited arose, it is true, over the establishment of separate schools as between white pupils and black pupils, but we cannot think that the question is any different or that any different result can be reached, assuming the cases above cited to be rightly decided, where the issue is as between white pupils and the pupils of the yellow race." The court held that the question of segregation was within the discretion of the state in regulating its public schools and did not conflict with the Fourteenth Amendment.

It is vigorously argued and not without some basis therefor that the later decisions of the Supreme Court in Me-

BLEED THROUGH

Laurin v. Oklahoma, 339 U. S. 637, and Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629, show a trend away from the Plessy and Lum cases. McLaurin v. Oklahoma arose under the segregation laws of Oklahoma. McLaurin, a colored student, applied for admission to the University of Oklahoma in order to pursue studies leading to a doctorate degree in education. He was denied admission solely because he was a negro. After litigation in the courts, which need not be reviewed herein, the legislature amended the statute permitting the admission of colored students to institutions of higher learning attended by white students, but providing that such instruction should be given on a segregated basis; that the instruction be given in separate class rooms or at separate times. In compliance with this statute McLaurin was admitted to the university but was required to sit at a separate desk in the ante room adjoining the class room; to sit at a designated desk on the mezzanine floor of the library; and to sit at a designated table and eat at a different time from the other students in the school cafeteria. These restrictions were held to violate his rights under the federal Constitution. The Supreme Court held that such treatment handicapped the student in his pursuit of effective graduate instruction.[3]

---

[3] The court said: "Our society grows increasingly complex, and our need for trained leaders increases correspondingly. Appellant's case represents, perhaps, the epitome of that need, for he is attempting to obtain an advanced degree in education, to become, by definition, a leader and trainer of others. Those who will come under his guidance and influence must be directly affected by the education he received. Their own education and development will necessarily suffer to the extent that his training is unequal to that of his classmates. State imposed restrictions which produce such inequalities cannot be sustained."

"It may be argued that appellant will be in no better position when these restrictions are removed, for he may still be set apart by his fellow students. This we think irrelevant. There is a vast difference—a Constitutional difference—between restrictions imposed by the state which prohibit the intellectual commingling of students, and the refusal of individuals to commingle where the state presents no such bar. * * * having been admitted to a state supported graduate school, [he] must receive the same treatment at the hands of the state as students of other races."

In Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U.S. 629, petitioner, a colored student, filed an application for admission to the University of Texas Law School. His application was rejected solely on the ground that he was a negro. In its opinion the Supreme Court stressed the educational benefits from commingling with white students. The court concluded by stating: "We cannot conclude that the education offered petitioner in a separate school is substantially equal to that which he would receive if admitted to the University of Texas Law School." If segregation within a school as in the McLaurin case is a denial of due process, it is difficult to see why segregation in separate schools would not result in the same denial. Or if the denial of the right to commingle with the majority group in higher institutions of learning as in the Sweatt case and gain the educational advantages resulting therefrom, is lack of due process, it is difficult to see why such denial would not result in the same lack of due process if practiced in the lower grades.

It must however be remembered that in both of these cases the Supreme Court made it clear that it was confining itself to answering the one specific question, namely: "To what extent does the equal protection clause limit the power of a state to distinguish between students of different races in professional and graduate education in a state university?", and that the Supreme Court refused to review the Plessy case because that question was not essential to a decision of the controversy in the case.

We are accordingly of the view that the Plessy and Lum cases, supra, have not been overruled and that they still presently are authority for the maintenance of a segregated school system in the lower grades.

The prayer for relief will be denied and judgment will be entered for defendants for costs.

Findings of Fact

I

This is a class action in which plaintiffs seek a decree, declaring Section 72-1724 of the General Statutes of Kansas 1949 to be unconstitutional, insofar as it empowers the Board of Education of the City of Topeka "to organize and maintain separate schools for the education of white and colored children" and an injunction restraining the enforcement, operation and execution of that portion of the statute and of the segregation instituted thereunder by the School Board.

II

This suit arises under the Constitution of the United States and involves more than $3,000 exclusive of interest and costs. It is also a civil action to redress an alleged deprivation, under color of State law, of a right, privilege or immunity secured by the Constitution of the United States providing for equal rights of citizens and to have the court declare the rights and other legal relations of the interested parties. The Court has jurisdiction of the subject matter and of the parties to the action.

III

Pursuant to statutory authority contained in Section 72-1724 of the General Statutes of Kansas 1949, the City of Topeka, Kansas, a city of the first class, has established and maintains a segregated system for the first six grades. It has established and maintains in the Topeka School District, eighteen schools for white children and four for colored children, the latter being located in neighborhoods where the population is predominantly colored. The City of Topeka is one school district. The colored children may attend any one of the four schools established for them, the choice being made either by the children or by their parents.

IV

There is no material difference in the physical facilities in the colored schools and in the white schools and such facilities in the colored schools are not inferior in any material respect to those in the white schools.

V

The educational qualifications of the teachers and the quality of instruction in the colored schools are not inferior to and are comparable to those of the white schools.

VI

The courses of study prescribed by the State law are taught in both the colored schools and in the white schools. The prescribed courses of study are identical in both classes of schools.

VII

Transportation to and from school is furnished colored children in the segregated schools without cost to the children or to their parents. No such transportation is furnished to the white children in the segregated schools.

VIII

Segregation of white and colored children in public schools has a detrimental effect upon the colored children. The impact is greater when it has the sanction of the law; for the policy of separating the races is usually interpreted as denoting the inferiority of the negro group. A sense of inferiority affects the motivation of a child to learn. Segregation with the sanction of law, therefore, has a tendency to retain the educational and mental development of negro children and to deprive them of some of the benefits they would receive in a racial integrated school system.

IX

The court finds as facts the stipulated facts and those agreed upon by counsel at the pre-trial and during the course of the trial.

Conclusions of Law

I

This court has jurisdiction of the subject matter and of the parties to the action.[10]

II

We conclude that no discrimination is practiced against plaintiffs in the colored schools set apart for them because of the nature of the physical characteristics of the buildings, the equipment, the curricula, quality of instructors and instruction or school services furnished and that they are denied no constitutional rights or privileges by reason of any of these matters.

III

Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537, and Gong Lum v. Rice, 275 U.S. 78, upholds the constitutionality of a legally segregated school system in the lower grades and no denial of due process results from the maintenance of such a segregated system of schools absent discrimination in the maintenance of the segregated schools. We conclude that the above cited cases have not been overruled by the later cases of McLaurin v. Oklahoma, 339 U.S. 637, and Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U.S. 629.

IV

The only question in the case under the record is whether legal segregation in and of itself without more constitutes denial of due process. We are of the view that under the above decisions of the Supreme Court the answer must be in the negative. We accordingly conclude that plaintiffs have suffered no denial of due process by virtue of the manner in which the segregated school system of Topeka, Kan-

A joint Resolution creating a temporary commission to study and make a report on acts of employment discrimination against citizens because of race, creed, color, religion or national origin, prescribing its powers and duties and making appropriations therefor.

Whereas, It has been brought to the attention of the legislature of the State of Kansas that probable cause exists for the belief that acts of discrimination in employment are

Whereas, The state of Kansas is traditionally and historically opposed to discrimination against any of its citizens in employment; and

Whereas, It is the public policy of this state that all of the citizens of this state are entitled to work without restrictions or limitations based on race, religion, creed or national origin; and

Whereas,The legislature does not have sufficient information upon which to enact adequate and proper laws and there is a difference of opinion as to whether the alleged discriminatory employment conditions actually exist: Now, therefore

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Kansas, the Senate agreeing thereto:

§ 1. There is hereby created a temporary commission, hereinafter referred to as the commission, to be known as the "Kansas commission against employment discrimination" consisting of five (5) members to be appointed by the governor.

§ 2. The commission shall organize and elect a chairman, vice-chairman and secretary on or before June 1, 1949, and is hereby authorized to hold such meeting at such times and places within this state as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this resolution. BOARD OF EDUCATION OF TOPEKA, SHAWNEE COUNTY, KANSAS, et al.

BRIEF FOR APPELLANTS

Opinion Below

The opinion of the statutory three-judge-District Court for the District of Kansas (R. 238-244) is reported at 98 F. Supp. 797.

Jurisdiction

The judgment of the court below was entered on August 3, 1951 (R. 247). On October 1, 1951, appellants filed a petition for appeal (R. 248), and an order allowing the appeal was entered (R. 250). Probable jurisdiction was noted on June 9, 1952 (R. 254). Jurisdiction of this Court rests on Title 28, United States Code, §§ 1253 and 2201(b).

Questions Presented

1. Whether the State of Kansas has power to enforce a state statute pursuant to which racially segregated public elementary schools are maintained.

2. Whether the finding of the court below—that racial segregation in public elementary schools has the detrimental effect of retarding the mental and educational development of colored children and connotes governmental acceptance of the conception of racial inferiority—compels the conclusion that appellants here are deprived of their rights to share equally in educational opportunities in violation of the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The Law of Kansas and the Statute Involved

All boards of education, superintendents of schools and school districts in the state are prohibited from using race as a factor in affording educational opportunities in the public schools within their respective jurisdictions unless expressly empowered to do so by statute. Knox v. Board of Education, 54 K. 152, 25 P. 616 (1891); Cartwright v. Board of Education, 73 K. 32, 84 P. 382 (1906); Rowles v. Board of Education, 76 K. 361, 91 P. 88 (1907); Woolridge, et al. v. Board of Education, 98 K. 397, 157 P. 1184 (1916); Thurman-Watts v. Board of Education, 115 K. 328, 222 P. 123 (1924); Webb v. School District, 167 K. 395, 206 P. 2d 1066 (1949).

Segregated elementary schools in cities of the first class are maintained solely pursuant to authority of Chapter 72-1724 of the General Statutes of Kansas, 1949, which reads as follows:

> "Powers of board; separate schools for white and colored children; manual training. The board of education shall have power to elect their own officers, make all necessary rules for the government of the schools of such city under its charge and control and of the board, subject to the provisions of this act and the laws of this state; to organize and maintain separate schools for the education of white and colored children, including the high schools in Kansas City, Kans.; no discrimination on account of color shall be made in high schools except as provided herein; to exercise the sole control over the public schools and school property of such city; and shall have the power to establish a high school or high schools in connection with manual training and instruction or otherwise, and to maintain the same as a part of the public-school system of said city. (G. S. 1868, Ch. 18, § 75; L. 1879, Ch. 81, § 1; L. 1905, Ch. 414, § 1; Feb. 28; R. S. 1923, § 72-1724.)"

BLEED THROUGH

Statement of the Case

Appellants are of Negro origin and are citizens of the United States and of the State of Kansas (R. 3-4). Infant appellants are children eligible to attend and are now attending elementary schools in Topeka, Kansas, a city of the first class within the meaning of Chapter 72-1724, General Statutes of Kansas, 1949, hereinafter referred to as the statute. Adult appellants are parents of minor appellants and are required by law to send their respective children to public schools designated by appellees (R. 3-4). Appellees are state officers empowered by state law to maintain and operate the public schools of Topeka, Kansas.

For elementary school purposes, the City of Topeka is divided into 18 geographical divisions designated as territories (R. 24). In each of these territories one elementary school services white children exclusively (R. 24). In addition, four schools are maintained for the use of Negro children exclusively (R. 11, 12). These racial distinctions are enforced pursuant to the statute. In accordance with the terms of the statute there is no segregation of Negro and white children in junior and senior high schools (R. 12).

On March 22, 1951, appellants instituted the instant action seeking to restrain the enforcement, operation and execution of the statute on the ground that it deprived them of equal educational opportunities within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment (R. 2-7). In their answer, appellees admitted that they acted pursuant to the statute, and that infant appellants were not eligible to attend any of the 18 white elementary schools solely because of their race and color (R. 12). The Attorney General of the State of Kansas filed a separate answer for the specific purpose of defending the constitutional validity of the statute in question (R. 14).

Thereupon, the court below was convened in accordance with Title 28, United States Code, § 2284. On June 25-26, a trial on the merits took place (R. 63 et seq.). On August 3, 1951, the court below filed its opinion (R. 238-244), its findings of fact (R. 244-246), and conclusions of law (R. 246-247), and entered a final judgment and decree in appellees' favor denying the injunctive relief sought (R. 247).

Specifications of Error

The District Court erred:

1. In refusing to grant appellants' application for a permanent injunction to restrain appellees from acting pursuant to the statute under which they are maintaining separate public elementary schools for Negro children solely because of their race and color.

2. In refusing to hold that the State of Kansas is without authority to promulgate the statute because it enforces a classification based upon race and color which is violative of the Constitution of the United States.

BLEED THROUGH

3. In refusing to enter judgment in favor of appellants after finding that enforced attendance at racially segregated elementary schools was detrimental and deprived them of educational opportunities equal to those available to white children.

Summary of Argument

The Fourteenth Amendment precludes a state from imposing distinctions or classifications based upon race and color alone. The State of Kansas has no power thereunder to use race as a factor in affording educational opportunities to its citizens.

Racial segregation in public schools reduces the benefits of public education to one group solely on the basis of race and color and is a constitutionally proscribed distinction. Even assuming that the segregated schools attended by appellants are not inferior to other elementary schools in Topeka with respect to physical facilities, instruction and courses of study, unconstitutional inequality inheres in the retardation of intellectual development and distortion of personality which Negro children suffer as a result of enforced isolation in school from the general public school population. Such injury and inequality are established as facts on this appeal by the uncontested findings of the District Court.

The District Court reasoned that it could not rectify the inequality that it had found because of this Court's decisions in Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537 and Gong Lum v. Rice, 275 U. S. 78. This Court has already decided that the Plessy case is not in point. Reliance upon Gong Lum v. Rice is mistaken since the basic assumption of that case is the existence of equality while no such assumption can be made here in the face of the established facts. Moreover, more recent decisions of this Court, most notably Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629 and McLaurin v. Board of Regents, 339 U. S. 637, clearly show that such hurtful consequences of segregated schools as appear here constitute a denial of equal educational opportunities in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. Therefore, the court below erred in denying the relief prayed by appellants.

ARGUMENT

I

The State of Kansas in affording opportunities for elementary education to its citizens has no power under the Constitution of the United States to impose racial restrictions and distinctions.

While the State of Kansas has undoubted power to confer benefits or impose disabilities upon selected groups of citizens in the normal execution of governmental functions, it must conform to constitutional standards in the exercise of this authority. These standards may be generally characterized as a requirement that the state's action be reasonable. Reasonableness in a constitutional sense is determined by examining the action of the state to discover whether the distinctions or restrictions in issue are in fact based upon real differences pertinent to a lawful legislative objective. Bain Peanut Co. v. Pinson, 282 U. S. 499; Lindsley v. Natural Carbonic Gas Co., 220 U. S. 61; Asbury Hospital v. Cass County, 326 U. S. 207; Metropolitan Casualty Insurance Co. v. Brownell, 294 U. S. 580; Dominion Hotel v. Arizona, 249 U. S. 265.

When the distinctions imposed are based upon race and color alone, the state's action is patently the epitome of that arbitrariness and capriciousness constitutionally impermissive under our system of government. Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356; Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U. S. 535. A racial criterion is a constitutional irrelevance, Edwards v. California, 314 U. S. 160, 184, and is not saved from condemnation even though dictated by a sincere desire to avoid the possibility of violence or race friction. Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U. S. 60; Morgan v. Virginia, 328 U. S. 373. Only because it was a war measure designed to cope with a grave national emergency was the federal government permitted to level restrictions against persons of enemy descent. Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U. S. 81; Oyama v. California, 332 U. S. 633. This action, "odious," Hirabayashi v. United States, supra, at page 100, and "suspect," Korematsu v. United States, 323 U. S. 214, 216, even in times of national peril, must cease as soon as that peril is past. Ex Parte Endo, 323 U. S. 283.

This Court has found violation of the equal protection clause in racial distinctions and restrictions imposed by the states in selection for jury service, Shepherd v. Florida, 341 U. S. 50; ownership and occupancy of real property, Shelley v. Kramer, 334 U. S. 1; Buchanan v. Warley, supra; gainful employment, Takahashi v. Fish and Game Commission, 334 U. S. 410; voting, Nixon v. Condon, 286 U. S. 73; and graduate and professional education. McLaurin v. Board of Regents, supra; Sweatt v. Painter, supra. The commerce clause in proscribing the imposition of racial distinctions and restrictions in the field of interstate travel is a further limitation of state power in this regard. Morgan v. Virginia, 328 U. S. 373.

Since 1940, in an unbroken line of decisions, this Court has clearly enunciated the doctrine that the state may not validly impose distinctions and restrictions among its citizens based upon race or color alone in each field of governmental activity where question has been raised.

Smith v. Allwright, 321 U. S. 649; Sipuel v. Board of Education, 332 U. S. 631; Sweatt v. Painter, supra; Pierre v. Louisiana, 306 U. S. 354; Hill v. Texas, 316 U. S. 400; Morgan v. Virginia, supra; McLaurin v. Board of Regents, supra; Oyama v. California, supra; Takahashi v. Fish and Game Commission, supra; Shelley v. Kraemer, supra; Shepherd v. Florida, supra; Cassell v. Texas, 339 U. S. 282. On the other hand, when the state has sought to protect its citizenry against racial discrimination and prejudice, its action has been consistently upheld, Railway Mail Association v. Corsi, 326 U. S. 88, even though taken in the field of foreign commerce. Bob-Lo Excursion Co. v. Michigan, 333 U. S. 28.

It follows, therefore, that under this doctrine, the State of Kansas which by statutory sanctions seeks to subject appellants, in their pursuit of elementary education, to distinctions based upon race or color alone, is here attempting to exceed the constitutional limits to its authority. For that racial distinction which has been held arbitrary in so many other areas of governmental activity is no more appropriate and can be no more reasonable in public education.

II

The court below, having found that appellants were denied equal educational opportunities by virtue of the segregated school system, erred in denying the relief prayed.

The court below made the following finding of fact:

> "Segregation of white and colored children in public schools has a detrimental effect upon the colored children. The impact is greater when it has the sanction of the law; for the policy of separating > the races is usually interpreted as denoting the inferiority of the negro group. A sense of inferiority affects the motivation of a child to learn. Segregation with the sanction of law, therefore, has a tendency to retard the educational and mental development of negro children and to deprive them of some of the benefits they would receive in a racially integrated school system."

BLEED THROUGH

This finding is based upon uncontradicted testimony that conclusively demonstrates that racial segregation injures infant appellants in denying them the opportunity available to all other racial groups to learn to live, work and cooperate with children representative of approximately 90% of the population of the society in which they live (R. 216); to develop citizenship skills; and to adjust themselves personally and socially in a setting comprising a cross-section of the dominant population (R. 132). The testimony further developed the fact that the enforcement of segregation under law denies to the Negro status, power and privilege (R. 176); interferes with his motivation for learning (R. 171); and instills in him a feeling of inferiority (R. 169) resulting in a personal insecurity, confusion and frustration that condemns him to an ineffective role as a citizen and member of society (R. 165). Moreover, it was demonstrated that racial segregation is supported by the myth of the Negro's inferiority (R. 177), and where, as here, the state enforces segregation, the communuity at large is supported in or converted to the belief that this myth has substance in fact (R. 156, 169, 177). It was testified that because of the peculiar educational system in Kansas that requires segregation only in the lower grades, there is an additional injury in that segregation occurring at an early age is greater in its impact and more permanent in its effects (R. 172) even though there is a change to integrated schools at the upper levels.

That these conclusions are the consensus of social scientists is evidenced by the appendix filed herewith. Indeed, the findings of the court that segregation constitutes discrimination are supported on the face of the statute itself where it states that: " • • • no discrimination on account of color shall be made in high schools except as provided herein • • • " (emphasis supplied).

Under the Fourteenth Amendment equality of educational opportunities necessitates an evaluation of all factors affecting the educational process. Sweatt v. Painter, supra; McLaurin v. Board of Regents, supra. Applying this yardstick, any restrictions or distinction based upon race or color that places the Negro at a disadvantage in relation to other racial groups in his pursuit of educational opportunities is violative of the equal protection clause.

In the instant case, the court found as a fact that appellants were placed at such a disadvantage and were denied educational opportunities equal to those available to white students. It necessarily follows, therefore, that the court should have concluded as a matter of law that appellants were deprived of their right to equal educational opportunities in violation of the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Under the mistaken notion that Plessy v. Ferguson and Gong Lum v. Rice were controlling with respect to the validity of racial distinctions in elementary education, the trial court refused to conclude that appellants were here denied equal educational opportunities in violation of their constitutional rights. Thus, notwithstanding that it had found inequality in educational opportunity as a fact, the court concluded as a matter of law that such inequality did not constitute a denial of constitutional rights, saying:

> "Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537, and Gong Lum v. Rice, 275 U. S. 78, uphold the constitution-> ality of a legally segregated school system in the lower grades and no denial of due process results from the maintenance of such a segregated system of schools absent discrimination in the maintenance of the segregated schools. We conclude that the above-cited cases have not been overruled by the later case of McLaurin v. Oklahoma, 339 U. S. 637, and Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629."

Plessy v. Ferguson is not applicable. Whatever doubts may once have existed in this respect were removed by this Court in Sweatt v. Painter, supra, at page 635, 636.

Gong Lum v. Rice is irrelevant to the issues in this case. There, a child of Chinese parentage was denied admission to a school maintained exclusively for white children and was ordered to attend a school for Negro children. The power of the state to make racial distinctions in its school system was not in issue. Petitioner contended that she had a constitutional right to go to school with white children, and that in being compelled to attend school with Negroes, the state had deprived her of the equal protection of the laws.

Further, there was no showing that her educational opportunities had been diminished as a result of the state's compulsion, and it was assumed by the Court that equality in fact existed. There the petitioner was not inveighing against the system, but that its application resulted in her classification as a Negro rather than as a white person, and indeed by so much conceded the propriety of the system itself. Were this not true, this Court would not have found basis for holding that the issue raised was one "which has been many times decided to be within the constitutional power of the state" and, therefore, did not "call for very full argument and consideration."

In short, she raised no issue with respect to the state's power to enforce racial classifications, as do appellants here. Rather, her objection went only to her treatment under the classification. This case, therefore, cannot be pointed to as a controlling precedent covering the instant case in which the constitutionality of the system itself is the basis for attack and in which it is shown the inequality in fact exists.

In any event the assumptions in the Gong Lum case have since been rejected by this Court. In the Gong Lum case, without "full argument and consideration," the Court assumed the state had power to make racial distinctions in its public schools without violating the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and assumed the state and lower federal court cases cited in support of this assumed state power had been correctly decided. Language in Plessy v. Ferguson was cited in support of these assumptions. These assumptions upon full argument and consideration were rejected in the McLaurin and Sweatt cases in relation to racial distinctions in state graduate and professional education. And, according to those cases, Plessy v. Ferguson, is not controlling for the purpose of determining the state's power to enforce racial segregation in public schools.

Thus, the very basis of the decision in the Gong Lum case has been destroyed. We submit, therefore, that this Court has considered the basic issue involved here only in those cases dealing with racial distinctions in education at the graduate and professional levels. Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, 305 U. S. 337; Sipuel v. Board of Education, supra; Fisher v. Hurst, 333 U. S. 147; Sweatt v. Painter, supra; McLaurin v. Board of Regents, supra.

In the McLaurin and Sweatt cases, this Court measured the effect of racial restrictions upon the educational development of the individual affected, and took into account the community's actual evaluation of the schools involved. In the instant case, the court below found as a fact that racial segregation in elementary education denoted the inferiority of Negro children and retarded their educational and mental development. Thus the same factors which led to the result reached in the McLaurin and Sweatt cases are present. Their underlying principles, based upon sound analyses, control the instant case.

Conclusion

In light of the foregoing, we respectfully submit that appellants have been denied their rights to equal educational opportunities within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment and that the judgment of the court below should be reversed.

The Effects of Segregation and the Consequences of Desegregation: A Social Science Statement

I

The problem of the segregation of racial and ethnic groups constitutes one of the major problems facing the American people today. It seems desirable, therefore, to summarize the contributions which contemporary social science can make toward its resolution. There are, of course, moral and legal issues involved with respect to which the signers of the present statement cannot speak with any special authority and which must be taken into account in the solution of the problem. There are, however, also factual issues involved with respect to which certain conclusions seem to be justified on the basis of the available scientific evidence. It is with these issues only that this paper is concerned. Some of the issues have to do with the consequences of segregation, some with the problems of changing from segregated to unsegregated practices. These two groups of issues will be dealt with in separate sections below. It is necessary, first, however, to define and delimit the problem to be discussed.

Definitions

For purposes of the present statement, segregation refers to that restriction of opportunities for different types of associations between the members of one racial, religious, national or geographic origin, or linguistic group and those of other groups, which results from or is supported by the action of any official body or agency representing some branch of government. We are not here concerned with such segregation as arises from the free movements of individuals which are neither enforced nor supported by official bodies, nor with the segregation of criminals or of individuals with communicable diseases which aims at protecting society from those who might harm it.

Where the action takes place in a social milieu in which the groups involved do not enjoy equal social status, the group that is of lesser social status will be referred to as the segregated group.

BLEED THROUGH

In dealing with the question of the effects of segregation, it must be recognized that these effects do not take place in a vacuum, but in a social context. The segregation of Negroes and of other groups in the United States takes place in a social milieu in which "race" prejudice and discrimination exist. It is questionable in the view of some students of the problem whether it is possible to have segregation without substantial discrimination. Myrdal[1] states: "Segregation * * * is financially possible and, indeed, a device of economy only as it is combined with substantial discrimination" (p. 629). The imbededness of segregation in such a context makes it difficult to disentangle the effects of segregation per se from the effects of the context. Similarly, it is difficult to disentangle the effects of segregation from the effects of a pattern of social disorganization commonly associated with it and reflected in high disease and mortality rates, crime and delinquency, poor housing, disrupted family life and general substandard living conditions. We shall, however, return to this problem after consideration of the observable effects of the total social complex in which segregation is a major component.

II

At the recent Mid-century White House Conference on Children and Youth, a fact-finding report on the effects of prejudice, discrimination and segregation on the personality development of children was prepared as a basis for some of the deliberations.[2] This report brought together the available social science and psychological studies which were related to the problem of how racial and religious prejudices influenced the development of a healthy personality. It highlighted the fact that segregation, prejudices and discriminations, and their social concomitants potentially damage the personality of all children—the children of the majority group in a somewhat different way than the more obviously damaged children of the minority group.

The report indicates that as minority group children learn the inferior status to which they are assigned—as they observe the fact that they are almost always segregated and kept apart from others who are treated with more respect by the society as a whole—they often react with feelings of inferiority and a sense of personal humiliation. Many of them become confused about their own personal worth. On the one hand, like all other human beings they require a sense of personal dignity; on the other hand, almost nowhere in the larger society do they find their own dignity as human beings respected by others. Under these conditions, the minority group child is thrown into a conflict with regard to his feelings about himself and his group. He wonders whether his group and he himself are worthy of no more respect than they receive. This conflict and confusion leads to self-hatred and rejection of his own group.

The report goes on to point out that these children must find ways with which to cope with this conflict. Not every child, of course, reacts with the same patterns of behavior. The particular pattern depends upon many interrelated factors, among which are: the stability and quality of his family relations; the social and economic class to which he belongs; the cultural and educational background of his parents; the particular minority group to which he belongs; his personal characteristics, intelligence, special talents, and personality pattern.

Some children, usually of the lower socio-economic classes, may react by overt aggressions and hostility directed toward their own group or members of the dominant group.[3] Anti-social and delinquent behavior may often be interpreted as reactions to these racial frustrations. These reactions are self-destructive in that the larger society not only punishes those who commit them, but often interprets such aggressive and anti-social behavior as justification for continuing prejudice and segregation.

Middle class and upper class minority group children are likely to react to their racial frustrations and conflicts by withdrawal and submissive behavior. Or, they may react with compensatory and rigid conformity to the prevailing middle class values and standards and an aggressive determination to succeed in these terms in spite of the handicap of their minority status.

The report indicates that minority group children of all social and economic classes often react with a generally defeatist attitude and a lowering of personal ambitions. This, for example, is reflected in a lowering of pupil morale and a depression of the educational aspiration level among minority group children in segregated schools. In producing such effects, segregated schools impair the ability of the child to profit from the educational opportunities provided him.

Many minority group children of all classes also tend to be hypersensitive and anxious about their relations with the larger society. They tend to see hostility and rejection even in those areas where these might not actually exist.

The report concludes that while the range of individual differences among members of a rejected minority group is as wide as among other peoples, the evidence suggests that all of these children are unnecessarily encumbered in some ways by segregation and its concomitants.

With reference to the impact of segregation and its concomitants on children of the majority group, the report indicates that the effects are somewhat more obscure. Those children who learn the prejudices of our society are also being taught to gain personal status in an unrealistic and non-adaptive way. When comparing themselves to members of the minority group, they are not required to evaluate themselves in terms of the more basic standards of actual personal ability and achievement. The culture permits and, at times, encourages them to direct their feelings of hostility and aggression against whole groups of people the members of which are perceived as weaker than themselves. They often develop patterns of guilt feelings, rationalizations and other mechanisms which they must use in an attempt to protect themselves from recognizing the essential injustice of their unrealistic fears and hatreds of minority groups.[4]

The report indicates further that confusion, conflict, moral cynicism, and disrespect for authority may arise in majority group children as a consequence of being taught the moral, religious and democratic principles of the brotherhood of man and the importance of justice and fair play by the same persons and institutions who, in their support of racial segregation and related practices, seem to be acting in a prejudiced and discriminatory manner. Some individuals may attempt to resolve this conflict by intensifying their hostility toward the minority group. Others may react by guilt feelings which are not necessarily reflected in more humane attitudes toward the minority group. Still others react by developing an unwholesome, rigid, and uncritical idealization of all authority figures—their parents, strong political and economic leaders. As described in The Authoritarian Personality,[5] they despise the weak, while they obsequiously and unquestioningly conform to the demands of the strong whom they also, paradoxically, subconsciously hate.

With respect to the setting in which these difficulties develop, the report emphasized the role of the home, the school, and other social institutions. Studies [6] have shown that from the earliest school years children are not only aware of the status differences among different groups in the society but begin to react with the patterns described above.

Conclusions similar to those reached by the Mid-century White House Conference Report have been stated by other social scientists who have concerned themselves with this problem. The following are some examples of these conclusions:

Segregation imposes upon individuals a distorted sense of social reality.[7]

Segregation leads to a blockage in the communications and interaction between the two groups. Such blockages tend to increase mutual suspicion, distrust and hostility.[8]

Segregation not only perpetuates rigid stereotypes and reinforces negative attitudes toward members of the other group, but also leads to the development of a social climate within which violent outbreaks of racial tensions are likely to occur.[9]

We return now to the question, deferred earlier, of what it is about the total society complex of which segregation is one feature that produces the effects described above—or, more precisely, to the question of whether we can justifiably conclude that, as only one feature of a complex social setting, segregation is in fact a significantly contributing factor to these effects.

To answer this question, it is necessary to bring to bear the general fund of psychological and sociological knowledge concerning the role of various environmental influences in producing feelings of inferiority, confusions in personal roles, various types of basic personality structures and the various forms of personal and social disorganization.

On the basis of this general fund of knowledge, it seems likely that feelings of inferiority and doubts about personal worth are attributable to living in an underprivileged environment only insofar as the latter is itself perceived as an indicator of low social status and as a symbol of inferiority. In other words, one of the important determinants in producing such feelings is the awareness of social status difference. While there are many other factors that serve as reminders of the differences in social status, there can be little doubt that the fact of enforced segregation is a major factor.[10]

BLEED THROUGH

This seems to be true for the following reasons among others: (1) because enforced segregation results from the decision of the majority group without the consent of the segregated and is commonly so perceived; and (2) because historically segregation patterns in the United States were developed on the assumption of the inferiority of the segregated.

In addition, enforced segregation gives official recognition and sanction to these other factors of the social complex, and thereby enhances the effects of the latter in creating the awareness of social status differences and feelings of inferiority.[11] The child who, for example, is compelled to attend a segregated school may be able to cope with ordinary expressions of prejudice by regarding the prejudiced person as evil or misguided; but he cannot readily cope with symbols of authority, the full force of the authority of the State—the school or the school board, in this instance—in the same manner. Given both the ordinary expression of prejudice and the school's policy of segregation, the former takes on greater force and seemingly becomes an official expression of the latter.

Not all of the psychological traits which are commonly observed in the social complex under discussion can be related so directly to the awareness of status differences—which in turn is, as we have already noted, materially contributed to by the practices of segregation. Thus, the low level of aspiration and defeatism so commonly observed in segregated groups is undoubtedly related to the level of self-evaluation; but it is also, in some measure, related among other things to one's expectations with regard to opportunities for achievement and, having achieved, to the opportunities for making use of these achievements. Similarly, the hypersensitivity and anxiety displayed by many minority group children about their relations with the larger society probably reflects their awareness of status differences; but it may also be influenced by the relative absence of opportunities for equal status contact which would provide correctives for prevailing unrealistic stereotypes.

The preceding view is consistent with the opinion stated by a large majority (90%) of social scientists who replied to a questionaire concerning the probable effects of enforced segregation under conditions of equal facilities. This opinion was that, regardless of the facilities which are provided, enforced segregation is psychologically detrimental to the members of the segregated group.[12]

Similar considerations apply to the question of what features of the social complex of which segregation is a part contribute to the development of the traits which have been observed in majority group members. Some of these are probably quite closely related to the awareness of status differences, to which, as has already been pointed out, segregation makes a material contribution. Others have a more complicated relationship to the total social setting. Thus, the acquisition of an unrealistic basis for self-evaluation as a consequence of majority group membership probably reflects fairly closely the awareness of status differences. On the other hand, unrealistic fears and hatreds of minority groups, as in the case of the converse phenomenon among minority group members, are probably significantly influenced as well by the lack of opportunities for equal status contact.

With reference to the probable effects of segregation under conditions of equal facilities on majority group members, many of the social scientists who responded to the poll in the survey cited above felt that the evidence is less convincing than with regard to the probable effects of such segregation on minority group members, and the effects are possibly less widespread. Nonetheless, more than 80% stated it as their opinion that the effects of such segregation are psychologically detrimental to the majority group members.[13]

It may be noted that many of these social scientists supported their opinions on the effects of segregation on both majority and minority groups by reference to one or another or to several of the following four lines of published and unpublished evidence.[14] First, studies of children throw light on the relative priority of the awareness of status differentials and related factors as compared to the awareness of differences in facilities. On this basis, it is possible to infer some of the consequences of segregation as distinct from the influence of inequalities of facilities. Second, clinical studies and depth interviews throw light on the genetic sources and causal sequences of various patterns of psychological reaction; and, again, certain inferences are possible with respect to the effects of segregation per se. Third, there actually are some relevant but relatively rare instances of segregation with equal or even superior facilities, as in the cases of certain Indian reservations. Fourth, since there are inequalities of facilities in racially and ethnically homogeneous groups, it is possible to infer the kinds of effects attributable to such inequalities in the absence of effects of segregation and, by a kind of subtraction to estimate the effects of segregation per se in situations where one finds both segregation and unequal facilities.

Segregation is at present a social reality. Questions may be raised, therefore, as to what are the likely consequences of desegregation.

One such question asks whether the inclusion of an intellectually inferior group may jeopardize the education of the more intelligent group by lowering educational standards or damage the less intelligent group by placing it in a situation where it is at a marked competitive disadvantage. Behind this question is the assumption, which is examined below, that the presently segregated groups actually are inferior intellectually.

The available scientific evidence indicates that much, perhaps all, of the observable differences among various racial and national groups may be adequately explained in terms of environmental differences.[15] It has been found, for instance, that the differences between the average intelligence test scores of Negro and white children decrease, and the overlap of the distributions increases, proportionately to the number of years that the Negro children have lived in the North.[16] Related studies have shown that this change cannot be explained by the hypothesis of selective migration.[17] It seems clear, therefore, that fears based on the assumption of innate racial differences in intelligence are not well founded.

It may also be noted in passing that the argument regarding the intellectual inferiority of one group as compared to another is, as applied to schools, essentially an argument for homogeneous groupings of children by intelligence rather than by race. Since even those who believe that there are innate differences between Negroes and whites in America in average intelligence grant that considerable overlap between the two groups exists, it would follow that it may be expedient to group together the superior whites and Negroes, the average whites and Negroes, and so on. Actually, many educators have come to doubt the wisdom of class groupings made homogeneous solely on the basis of intelligence.[18] Those who are opposed to such homogeneous grouping believe that this type of segregation, too, appears to create generalized feelings of inferiority in the child who attends a below average class, leads to undesirable emotional consequences in the education of the gifted child, and reduces learning opportunities which result from the interaction of individuals with varied gifts.

A second problem that comes up in an evaluation of the possible consequences of desegregation involves the question of whether segregation prevents or stimulates interracial tension and conflict and the corollary question of whether desegregation has one or the other effect.

The most direct evidence available on this problem comes from observations and systematic study of instances in which desegregation has occurred. Comprehensive reviews of such instances [19] clearly establish the fact that desegrega-

Extensive desegregation has taken place without major incidents in the armed services in both Northern and Southern installations and involving officers and enlisted men from all parts of the country, including the South.[20] Similar changes have been noted in housing[21] and industry.[22] During the last war, many factories both in the North and South hired Negroes on a non-segregated, nondiscriminatory basis. services [27] and merchant marine,[28] recreation agency,[29] and general community life.[30]

Much depends, however, on the circumstances under which members of previously segregated groups first come in contact with others in unsegregated situations. Available evidence suggests, first, that there is less likelihood of unfriendly relations when the change is simultaneously introduced into all units of a social institution to which it is applicable—e.g., all of the schools in a school system or all of the shops in a given factory.[31] When factories introduced Negroes in only some shops but not in others the prejudiced workers tended to classify the desegregated

The available evidence also suggests the importance of consistent and firm enforcement of the new policy by those in authority.[32] It indicates also the importance of such factors as: the absence of competition for a limited number of facilities or benefits;[33] the possibility of contacts which permit individuals to learn about one another as individuals;[34] and the possibility of equivalence of positions and functions among all of the participants within the unsegregated situation.[35] These conditions can generally be satisfied in a number of situations, as in the armed services, public housing developments, and public schools.

ARGUMENT

Part One

PAGE

I. Normal exercise of the judicial function calls for a declaration that the state is without power to enforce distinctions based upon race or color in affording educational opportunities in the public schools 21

II. The statutory and constitutional provisions involved in these cases cannot be validated under separate but equal concept 31

A. Racial Segregation Cannot Be Squared With the Rationale of the Early Cases Interpreting the Reach of the Fourteenth Amendment 32

B. The First Time the Question Came Before the Court, Racial Segregation In Transportation Was Specifically Disapproved 36

C. The Separate But Equal Doctrine Marked An Unwarranted Departure From the Main Stream of Constitutional Development and Permits the Frustration of the Very Purposes of The Fourteenth Amendment As Defined by This Court 38

D. The Separate But Equal Doctrine Was Conceived in Error 40

1. The Dissenting Opinion of Justice Harlan in Plessy v. Ferguson 40

2. Custom, Usage and Tradition Rooted in the Slave Tradition Cannot Be the Constitutional Yardstick for Measuring State Action Under the Fourteenth Amendment .. 42

3. Preservation of Public Peace Cannot Justify Deprivation of Constitutional Rights 43

BLEED THROUGH

PAGE

4. The Separate but Equal Doctrine Deprives Negroes of That Protection Which the Fourteenth Amendment Accords Under the General Classification Test 45

E. The Separate But Equal Doctrine Has Not Received Unqualified Approval in This Court 47

F. The Necessary Consequence of the Sweatt and McLaurin Decisions is Repudiation of the Separate But Equal Doctrine 48

III. Viewed in the light of history the separate but equal doctrine has been an instrumentality of defiant nullification of the Fourteenth Amendment 50

A. The Status of the Negro, Slave and Free, Prior to the Civil War 50

B. The Post War Struggle 53

C. The Compromise of 1877 and the Abandonment of Reconstruction 56

D. Consequences of the 1877 Compromise 57

E. Nullification of the Rights Guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment and the Reestablishment of the Negro's Pre-Civil War Inferior Status Fully Realized 62

Conclusion of Part I 66

PART TWO

I. The Fourteenth Amendment was intended to destroy all caste and color legislation in the United States, including racial segregation 67

PAGE

A. The Era Prior to the Civil War Was Marked By Determined Efforts to Secure Recognition of the Principle of Complete and Real Equality For All Men Within the Existing Constitutional Framework of Our Government 69
Equality Under Law 70

B. The Movement For Complete Equality Reached Its Successful Culmination in the Civil War and the Fourteenth Amendment .. 75

C. The Principle of Absolute and Complete Equality Began to Be Translated Into Federal Law as Early as 1862 77

D. From the Beginning the Thirty-Ninth Congress Was Determined to Eliminate Race Distinctions From American Law 79
The Framers of the Fourteenth Amendment 93

E. The Fourteenth Amendment Was Intended to Write into the Organic Law of the United States the Principle of Absolute and Complete Equality in Broad Constitutional Language 103

F. The Republican Majority in the 39th Congress Was Determined to Prevent Future Congresses from Diminishing Federal Protection of These Rights 108

G. Congress Understood That While the Fourteenth Amendment Would Give Authority to Congress to Enforce Its Provisions, the Amendment in and of Itself Would Invalidate All Class Legislation by the States 114

Congress Intended to Destroy All Class Distinction In Law 118

H. The Treatment of Public Education or Segregation in Public Schools During the 39th Congress Must Be Considered in the Light of the Status of Public Education at That time 120

I. During the Congressional Debates on Proposed Legislation Which Culminated in the Civil Rights Act of 1875 Veterans of the Thirty-Ninth Congress Adhered to Their Conviction That the Fourteenth Amendment Had Proscribed Segregation in Public Schools 126

II. There is convincing evidence that the State Legislatures and conventions which ratified the Fourteenth Amendment contemplated and understood that it prohibited State legislation which would require racial segregation in public schools 139

A. The Eleven States Seeking Readmission Understood that the Fourteenth Amendment Stripped Them of Power to Maintain Segregated Schools 142

Arkansas 143

North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia and Florida 144

Texas 151

Virginia 152

Mississippi 153

Tennessee 155

B. The Majority of the Twenty-two Union States Ratifying the 14th Amendment Understood that it Forbade Compulsory Segregation in Public Schools 157

West Virginia and Missouri 158

The New England States 159

The Middle Atlantic States 164

The Western Reserve States 170

The Western States 177

PAGE

C. The Non-Ratifying States Understood that the Fourteenth Amendment Forbade Enforced Segregation in Public Schools 182

Maryland 183

Kentucky 184

California 185

Conclusions of Part II 186

PART THREE

1. This Court should declare invalid the constitutional and statutory provisions here involved requiring segregation in public schools. After careful consideration of all of the factors involved in transition from segregated school systems to unsegregated school systems, appellants know of no reasons or considerations which would warrant postponement of the enforcement of appellants' rights by this Court in the exercise of its equity powers 190

A. The Fourteenth Amendment requires that a decree be entered directing that appellants be admitted forthwith to public schools without distinction as to race or color 190

B. There is no equitable justification for postponement of appellants' enjoyment of their rights 191

C. Appellants are unable in good faith, to suggest terms for a decree which will secure effective gradual adjustment because no such decree will protect appellants' rights 195

Conclusion 198

APPEALS FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURTS FOR THE DISTRICT OF KANSAS, THE EASTERN DISTRICT OF SOUTH CAROLINA AND THE EASTERN DISTRICT OF VIRGINIA, AND ON PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE SUPREME COURT OF DELAWARE, RESPECTIVELY.

—o—

BRIEF FOR APPELLANTS IN NOS. 1, 2 AND 4 AND FOR RESPONDENTS IN NO. 10 ON REARGUMENT

Explanatory Statement

One brief is being filed in these four cases. They fundamentally involve the same questions and issues. As an aid to the Court, we are restating below a full history of each case.

Opinion Below

The opinion of the statutory three-judge District Court for the District of Kansas (R. 238-244) is reported at 98 F. Supp. 797.

Jurisdiction

The judgment of the court below was entered on August 3, 1951 (R. 247). On October 1, 1951, appellants filed a petition for appeal (R. 248), and an order allowing the appeal was entered (R. 250). Probable jurisdiction was noted on June 9, 1952 (R. 254). Jurisdiction of this Court rests on Title 28, United States Code, §§ 1253 and 2101(b).

Statement of the Case

Appellants are Negro students eligible to attend and attending elementary schools in Topeka, Kansas, and their parents (R. 3-4). Appellees are state officers empowered to maintain and operate the public schools of Topeka, Kansas (R. 4-5). On March 22, 1951, appellants commenced this class action against appellees to restrain them from enforcing and executing that part of Chapter 72-1724, General Statutes of Kansas, 1949, which permitted racial segregation in public elementary schools, on the ground that it violated the Fourteenth Amendment by depriving the infant appellants of equal educational opportunities (R. 2-7), and for a judgment declaring that the practice of appellees under said statute of maintaining and operating racially segregated elementary schools is in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Appellees admitted in their answer that they acted pursuant to the statute and that, solely because of their color, the infant appellants were not eligible to attend any of the elementary schools maintained exclusively for white students (R. 12). The Attorney General of the State of Kansas filed a separate answer specifically to defend the constitutional validity of the statute (R. 14).

The court below was convened in accordance with Title 28, United States Code, § 2284, and, on June 25-26, a trial on the merits was held (R. 63 et seq.). On August 3, 1951, the court below filed its opinion (R. 238-244), findings of fact (R. 244-246) and conclusions of law (R. 246-247) and entered a final judgment denying the injunctive relief sought (R. 247).

Specification of Errors

The court below erred:

1. In refusing to grant appellants' application for a permanent injunction to restrain appellees from acting pursuant to the statute under which they are maintaining separate public elementary schools for Negro children, solely because of their race and color.

2. In refusing to hold that the State of Kansas is without authority to promulgate the statute because it enforces a classification based upon race and color which is violative of the Constitution of the United States.

3. In refusing to enter judgment in favor of appellants after finding that enforced attendance at racially segregated elementary schools was detrimental and deprived them of educational opportunities equal to those available to white children.

NO. 2

Opinions Below

The majority and dissenting opinions of the statutory three-judge District Court for the Eastern District of South Carolina on the first hearing (R. 176-209) are reported in 98 F. Supp. 529-548. The opinion on the second hearing (R. 301-306) is reported in 103 F. Supp. 920-923.

Jurisdiction

The judgment of the court below was entered on March 13, 1952 (R. 306). A petition for appeal was filed below and allowed on May 10, 1952 (R. 309). Probable jurisdiction was noted on June 9, 1952 (R. 316). Jurisdiction of this Court rests on Title 28, United States Code, §§ 1253 and 2101(b).

Statement of the Case

Appellants are Negro children who reside in and are eligible to attend the public schools of School District No. 22, Clarendon County, South Carolina, and their respective parents and guardians (R. 4-5). Appellees are the public school officials of said district who, as officers of the state, maintain and operate the public schools of that district (R. 5-6). On December 22, 1950, appellants commenced this class action against appellees to enjoin enforcement of Article XI, Section 7, of the Constitution of South Carolina and Section 5377 of the Code of Laws of South Carolina of 1942, which require the segregation of races in public schools, on the ground that they deny to appellants the equal protection of the laws secured by the Fourteenth Amendment, and for a judgment declaring that said laws violate the Fourteenth Amendment and are invalid (R. 2-11).

BLEED THROUGH

Appellees in their answer admitted adherence to the said constitutional and statutory provisions requiring racial segregation in public schools and asserted that such provisions were a reasonable exercise of the police powers of the state and, therefore, were valid (R. 13-17).

A three-judge District Court was convened, pursuant to Title 28, United States Code, §§ 2284, and on July 25, 1951, a trial on the merits was held (R. 30 et seq.). On June 23, 1951, the court below filed its opinion (R. 176) and entered a final decree (R. 209): (1) upholding the constitutional validity of the contested state constitutional and statutory provisions; (2) denying the injunctive relief which was sought; (3) requiring appellees to furnish to appellants educational facilities equal to those furnished to white students; and (4) requiring appellees within six months to file a report of action taken toward that end.

An appeal from this judgment was allowed by this Court on July 20, 1951. The report required by the decree of the court below was filed on December 21, 1951, and subsequently forwarded to this Court. On January 28, 1952, this Court vacated the judgment of the court below and remanded the case for the purpose of obtaining the views of the court below on the additional facts in the record and to give it the opportunity to take such action as it might deem appropriate in light of the report. 342 U. S. 350. Mr. Justice Black and Mr. Justice Douglas dissented on the ground that the additional facts in the report were "wholly irrelevant to the constitutional questions presented by the appeal to this Court". 342 U. S. 350.

Pursuant to the mandate of this Court, a second trial was held in the court below on March 3, 1953 (R. 271), at which time the appellees filed an additional report showing progress made since the filing of the original report (R. 273). On March 13, 1952, the court below filed its opinion (R. 301) and entered a final decree (R. 306) again upholding the validity of the contested constitutional and statutory provisions, denying the injunctive relief requested and requiring appellees to afford to appellants educational facilities equal to those afforded to white students.

Specification of Errors

The court below erred:

1. In refusing to enjoin the enforcement of the laws of South Carolina requiring racial segregation in the public schools of Clarendon County on the ground that these laws violate rights secured under the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

2. In refusing to grant to appellants immediate and effective relief against the unconstitutional practice of excluding appellants from an opportunity to share the public school facilities of Clarendon County on an equal basis with other students without regard to race or color.

3. In predicating its decision on the doctrine of Plessy v. Ferguson and in disregarding the rationale of Sweatt v. Painter and McLaurin v. Board of Regents.

Opinion Below

The opinion of the statutory three-judge District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia (R. 617-623) is reported at 103 F. Supp. 337-341.

Jurisdiction

The judgment of the court below was entered on March 7, 1952 (R. 623). A petition for appeal was filed below and allowed on May 5, 1952 (R. 625, 630, 683). Probable jurisdiction was noted on October 8, 1952. —U. S. —, 97 L. ed. (Advance p. 27). Jurisdiction of this Court rests on Title 28, United States Code, §§ 1253 and 2101(b).

BLEED THROUGH

Statement of the Case

Appellants, high school students residing in Prince Edward County, Virginia, and their parents and guardians, brought a class action against appellees, the County School Board and the Division Superintendent of Schools on May 23, 1951. The complaint (R. 5-30) alleged that said appellees maintained separate public secondary schools for Negro and white children pursuant to Article IX, Section 140 of the Constitution of Virginia, and Title 22, Chapter 12, Article 1, section 22-221, of the Code of Virginia of 1950; that the Negro school was inferior and unequal to the white schools; and that it was impossible for the infant appellants to secure educational opportunities or facilities equal to those afforded white children similarly situated as long as said appellees enforce said laws or pursued a policy of racial segregation. It sought a judgment declaratory of the invalidity of said laws as a denial of rights secured by the due process and equal protection clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment, and an injunction restraining said appellees from enforcing said laws and from making any distinction based on race or color among children attending the secondary schools of the County.

Appellees admitted maintenance of said schools, enforcement of said laws, and inequalities as to physical plant and equipment, but denied that the segregation violated the Constitution (R. 32-36). Appellee, the Commonwealth of Virginia, intervened (R. 37) and made the same admissions and defense (R. 37-39).

On March 7, 1952, a three-judge District Court found the Negro school inferior in plant, facilities, curricula and means of transportation (R. 622-623) and ordered appellees forthwith to provide "substantially" equal curricula and transportation facilities and to "proceed with all reasonable diligence and dispatch to remove" the existing inequality "by building, furnishing and providing a high school building and facilities for Negro students" (R. 624). It refused to enjoin enforcement of the constitutional and statutory segregation provisions on the grounds: (1) that appellants' evidence as to the effects of educational segregation did not overbalance appellees', and that it accepted as "apt and able precedent" Briggs v. Elliott, 98 F. Supp. 529 (E. D. S. C. 1951) and Carr v. Corning, 182 F. 2d 14 (C. A. D. C. 1950) which "refused to decree that segregation be abolished incontinently" (R. 619); (2) that nullification of the segregation provisions was unwarranted in view of evidence that racial segregation was not based on prejudice or caprice but, rather, was "one of the ways of life in Virginia" (R. 620); (3) that segregation has begotten greater opportunities for the Negro (R. 621); (4) that elimination of segregation would lessen interest in and financial support of public schools (R. 621); and (5) that, finding "no hurt or harm to either race," it was not for the court "to adjudge the policy as right or wrong" (R. 621-622).

Specification of Errors

The court below erred:

1. In refusing to enjoin the enforcement of Article IX, Section 140 of the Constitution of Virginia, and Title 22, Chapter 12, Article 1, Section 22-221, of the Code of Virginia of 1950, upon the grounds that these laws violate rights secured by the due process and equal protection clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

2. In refusing to forthwith restrain appellees from using race as a factor in determining the assignment of public secondary educational facilities in Prince Edward County, Virginia, after it had found that appellants are denied equality of buildings, facilities, curricula and means of transportation in violation of the due process and equal protection clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment.

3. In refusing to hold that appellants are entitled to equality in all aspects of the public secondary educational process, in addition to equality in physical facilities and curricula.

4. In issuing a decree ordering appellees to equalize secondary school facilities in the County where such decree cannot be effectively enforced without involving the court in the daily operation and supervision of schools.

Opinions Below

The opinion of the Chancellor of the State of Delaware (A. 338) is reported at 87 A. (2d) 862. The opinion of the Supreme Court of Delaware (R. 37) is reported at 91 A. (2d) 137.*

Jurisdiction

The judgment of the court below was entered on August 28, 1952 (R. 37). On November 13, 1952 petition for writ of certiorari was filed herein. On November 20, 1952, respondents waived the filing of a brief in opposition to the petition for writ of certiorari and moved that, if certiorari were granted, the argument be advanced and heard immediately following argument in Nos. 8, 101 and 191. On November 24, 1952, the petition for writ of certiorari and motion to advance were granted. — U. S. —; 97 L. ed. (Advance, p. 124). Jurisdiction of this Court rests upon Title 28, United States Code, § 1257(3).

Appendix to petitioners' brief below will be indicated by A; the supplement to the petitioners' appendix below will be referred to as SA; respondents' appendix below will be referred to as RA; the supplement to respondents' appendix below will be referred to as RSA; the record of proceedings in the Supreme Court of Delaware will be referred to as R.

Statement of the Case

No. 10 arises from two separate class actions filed in the Court of Chancery of the State of Delaware by Negro school children and their guardians seeking admittance of the children to two public schools maintained by petitioners exclusively for white children in New Castle County, Delaware. In the courts below, plaintiffs prevailed, and they and members of their class are now attending the schools to which they sought admission, an application for stay of final order having been denied. (Brief of Respondents, No. 448, October Term, 1952, pp. 25-27). Thus, in this case, unlike the other school segregation cases now under consideration, plaintiffs are respondents in this Court. Nevertheless, they file their brief at this time along with appellants in Numbers 1, 2 and 4, because, on the fundamental issues, they take the same position as do those appellants, and because they believe that by so filing they will facilitate the Court's consideration of the matters at bar.

The complaint (A 3-13) in one of the two cases from which No. 10 arises, alleged that respondents residing in the Claymont Special School District were refused admittance to the Claymont High School maintained by petitioner-members of the State Board of Education and members of the Board of Education of the Claymont Special School District solely because of respondents' color. Because of this, these respondents were compelled to attend Howard High School (RA 47), a public school for Negroes only, in Wilmington, Delaware. Howard High School is operated and controlled by the Corporate Board of Public Education in Wilmington, not a party to this case (A 314-15, 352; R 57, RA 203). The second complaint (A 14-30) out of which No. 448 arises alleged that respondent was excluded from Hockessin School No. 29, a public elementary school maintained for white children only, by petitioner-members of the State Board of Education and petitioner-members of the Board of School Trustees of Hockessin School No. 29. Respondent and the class she represented at the time of the complaint, attended Hockessin School No. 107, maintained solely for Negroes by the State Board of Education. Respondents in both complaints asserted that the aforesaid state-imposed racial segregation required by Par. 2631, Revised Code of Delaware, 1935, and Article X, Section 1 of the Constitution of Delaware: (1) compelled them to attend schools substantially inferior to those for white children to which admittance was sought; and (2) injured their mental health, impeded their mental and personality development and made inferior their educational opportunity as compared with that offered by the state to white children similarly situated. Such treatment, respondents asserted, is prohibited by the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

BLEED THROUGH

Petitioners' answers (A 31-33, A 34-37) defended the exclusion: (1) upon mandatory constitutional and statutory provisions of the State of Delaware which require separate public schools for white and colored children; and (2) upon the fact that the educational opportunities offered respondents were equal to those offered white children similarly situated.

The two cases were consolidated and tried before the Chancellor. In an opinion (A 348-356; 87 A. (2d) 862) filed on April 1, 1952, the Chancellor found as a fact that in "our Delaware society" segregation in education practiced by petitioners "itself results in Negro children, as a class, receiving educational opportunities which are substantially inferior to those available to white children otherwise similarly situated." However, the Chancellor denied respondents' prayers for a judgment on this ground and refused to declare that the Delaware constitutional and statutory provisions violated respondents' right to equal protection. But the Chancellor did award respondents the relief which they requested because other inequalities were found to exist. These included, in the high school, teacher training, pupil-teacher ratio, extra-curricular activities, physical plant and esthetic considerations, and time and distance involved in travel. As to the elementary schools in question, the court found the Negro facilities inferior in building and site, esthetic considerations, teacher preparation and transportation facilities. A more detailed exposition of the facts upon which these findings were based is set forth in respondents' Brief in No. 448, October Term, 1952, pp. 27-44.

The Chancellor, as stated above, ordered that respondents be granted immediate relief in the only way that it was then available, that is, by admission to the superior facilities. On August 28, 1952, the Supreme Court of Delaware affirmed. 91 A. (2d) 137. Its findings on some of the facts were somewhat different than the Chancellor's but, on the whole, it agreed with him. Upholding the Chancellor's determination that the requested relief could not be granted because of the harmful psychological effect of racial segregation, it did not otherwise review his factual findings in this regard. Denying petitioners' plea for time to equalize the facilities in question, the Supreme Court held that in the high school case: (1) a decree ordering petitioners to equalize the facilities in question could have no effect on the legal entity having control of the Wilmington public schools which was not a party to the cause; and (2) that the court did not see how it could supervise and control the expenditure of state funds in a matter committed to the administrative discretion of school authorities. Finally, the court held that it could not issue a decree which would, in effect, deny to plaintiffs what it had held they rightfully deserved. As to the elementary school, the court also noted that defendants had not assumed the burden of showing to what extent remedial legislation had improved or could improve conditions in the future. Alluding to its antecedent discussion of the question of relief for high school respondents, it affirmed the Chancellor's finding on this issue also.

Stay of the order was denied by the Chancellor and by the Supreme Court of Delaware (Brief of Respondents, No. 448, October Term, 1952, pp. 25-27) and respondents and members of their class are now enjoying their second year of equal educational opportunities under the decree.

This Court's Order

These four cases were argued and submitted to the Court on December 9-11, 1952. Thereafter, on June 8, 1953, this Court entered its order for reargument, as follows, — U. S. —; 97 L. ed. (Advance p. 956):

> "Each of these cases is ordered restored to the docket and is assigned for reargument on Monday, October 12, next. In their briefs and on oral argument counsel are requested to discuss particularly the following questions insofar as they are relevant to the respective cases:
>
> "1. What evidence is there that the Congress which submitted and the State legislatures and conventions which ratified the Fourteenth Amendment contemplated or did not contemplate, understood or did not understand, that it would abolish segregation in public schools?
>
> "2. If neither the Congress in submitting nor the States in ratifying the Fourteenth Amendment understood that compliance with it would require the immediate abolition of segregation in public schools, was it nevertheless the understanding of the framers of the Amendment

> "(a) that future Congresses might, in the exercise of their power under Sec. 5 of the Amendment, abolish such segregation, or
> "(b) that it would be within the judicial power, in light of future conditions, to construe the Amendment as abolishing such segregation of its own force?

"3. On the assumption that the answers to questions 2 (a) and (b) do not dispose of the issue, is it within the judicial power, in construing the Amendment, to abolish segregation in public schools?

"4. Assuming it is decided that segregation in public schools violates the Fourteenth Amendment

"(a) would a decree necessarily follow providing that, within the limits set by normal geographic school districting, Negro children should forthwith be admitted to schools of their choice, or

"(b) may this Court, in the exercise of its equity powers, permit an effective gradual adjustment to be brought about from existing segregated systems to a system not based on color distinctions?

"5. On the assumption on which questions 4(a) and (b) are based, and assuming further that this Court will exercise its equity powers to the end described in question 4(b),

"(a) should this Court formulate detailed decrees in these cases;

"(b) if so what specific issues should the decrees reach;

"(c) should this Court appoint a special master to hear evidence with a view to recommending specific terms for such decrees;

"(d) should this Court remand to the courts of first instance with directions to frame decrees in these cases, and if so, what general directions should the decrees of this Court include and what procedures should the courts of first instance follow in arriving at the specific terms of more detailed decrees?

"The Attorney General of the United States is invited to take part in the oral argument and to file an additional brief if he so desires."

On August 4, 1953, upon motion of the Attorney General of the United States and without objection by the parties, this Court entered its order postponing the date assigned for reargument of these cases until December 7, 1953.

Summary of Argument

These cases consolidated for argument before this Court present in different factual contexts essentially the same ultimate legal questions.

The substantive question common to all is whether a state can, consistently with the Constitution, exclude children, solely on the ground that they are Negroes, from public schools which otherwise they would be qualified to attend. It is the thesis of this brief, submitted on behalf of the excluded children, that the answer to the question is in the negative: the Fourteenth Amendment prevents states from according differential treatment to American children on the basis of their color or race. Both the legal precedents and the judicial theories, discussed in Part I hereof, and the evidence concerning the intent of the framers of the Fourteenth Amendment and the understanding of the Congress and the ratifying states, developed in Part II hereof, support this proposition.

Denying this thesis, the school authorities, relying in part on language originating in this Court's opinion in Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537, urge that exclusion of Negroes, qua Negroes, from designated public schools is permissible when the excluded children are afforded admittance to other schools especially reserved for Negroes, qua Negroes, if such schools are equal.

The procedural question common to all the cases is the role to be played, and the time-table to be followed, by this Court and the lower courts in directing an end to the challenged exclusion, in the event that this Court determines, with respect to the substantive question, that exclusion of Negroes, qua Negroes, from public schools contravenes the Constitution.

The importance to our American democracy of the substantive question can hardly be overstated. The question is whether a nation founded on the proposition that "all men are created equal" is honoring its commitments to grant "due process of law" and "the equal protection of the laws" to all within its borders when it, or one of its constituent states, confers or denies benefits on the basis of color or race.

1. Distinctions drawn by state authorities on the basis of color or race violate the Fourteenth Amendment. Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U. S. 1; Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U. S. 60. This has been held to be true even as to the conduct of public educational institutions. Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629; McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U. S. 637. Whatever other purposes the Fourteenth Amendment may have had, it is indisputable that its primary purpose was to complete the emancipation provided by the Thirteenth Amendment by ensuring to the Negro equality before the law. The Slaughter-House Cases, 16 Wall. 36; Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U. S. 303.

2. Even if the Fourteenth Amendment did not per se invalidate racial distinctions as a matter of law, the racial segregation challenged in the instant cases would run afoul of the conventional test established for application of the equal protection clause because the racial classifications here have no reasonable relation to any valid legislative purpose. See Quaker City Cab Co. v. Pennsylvania, 277 U. S. 389; Truax v. Raich, 239 U. S. 33; Smith v. Cahoon, 283 U. S. 553; Mayflower Farms v. Ten Eyck, 297 U. S. 266; Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U. S. 535. See also Tunstall v. Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, 323 U. S. 192; Steele v. Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co., 323 U. S. 192.

3. Appraisal of the facts requires rejection of the contention of the school authorities. The educational detriment involved in racially constricting a student's associations has already been recognized by this Court.

BLEED THROUGH

Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629; McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U. S. 637.

4. The argument that the requirements of the Fourteenth Amendment are met by providing alternative schools rests, finally, on reiteration of the separate but equal doctrine enunciated in Plessy v. Ferguson.

Were these ordinary cases, it might be enough to say that the Plessy case can be distinguished—that it involved only segregation in transportation. But these are not ordinary cases, and in deference to their importance it seems more fitting to meet the Plessy doctrine head-on and to declare that doctrine erroneous.

Candor requires recognition that the plain purpose and effect of segregated education is to perpetuate an inferior status for Negroes which is America's sorry heritage from slavery. But the primary purpose of the Fourteenth Amendment was to deprive the states of all power to perpetuate such a caste system.

5. The first and second of the five questions propounded by this Court requested enlightment as to whether the Congress which submitted, and the state legislatures and conventions which ratified, the Fourteenth Amendment contemplated or understood that it would prohibit segregation in public schools, either of its own force or through subsequent legislative or judicial action. The evidence, both in Congress and in the legislatures of the ratifying states, reflects the substantial intent of the Amendment's proponents and the substantial understanding of its opponents that the Fourteenth Amendment would, of its own force, proscribe all forms of state-imposed racial distinctions, thus necessarily including all racial segregation in public education.

The Fourteenth Amendment was actually the culmination of the determined efforts of the Radical Republican majority in Congress to incorporate into our fundamental law the well-defined equalitarian principle of complete equality for all without regard to race or color. The debates in the 39th Congress and succeeding Congresses clearly reveal the intention that the Fourteenth Amendment would work a revolutionary change in our state-federal relationship by denying to the states the power to distinguish on the basis of race.

The Civil Rights Bill of 1866, as originally proposed, possessed scope sufficiently broad in the opinion of many Congressmen to entirely destroy all state legislation based on race. A great majority of the Republican Radicals—who later formulated the Fourteenth Amendment—understood and intended that the Bill would prohibit segregated schools. Opponents of the measure shared this understanding. The scope of this legislation was narrowed because it was known that the Fourteenth Amendment was in process of preparation and would itself have scope exceeding that of the original draft of the Civil Rights Bill.

6. The evidence makes clear that it was the intent of the proponents of the Fourteenth Amendment, and the substantial understanding of its opponents, that it would, of its own force, prohibit all state action predicated upon race or color. The intention of the framers with respect to any specific example of caste state action—in the instant cases, segregated education—cannot be determined solely on the basis of a tabulation of contemporaneous statements mentioning the specific practice. The framers were formulating a constitutional provision setting broad standards for determination of the relationship of the state to the individual. In the nature of things they could not list all the specific categories of existing and prospective state activity which were to come within the constitutional prohibitions. The broad general purpose of the Amendment—obliteration of race and color distinctions—is clearly established by the evidence. So far as there was consideration of the Amendment's impact upon the undeveloped educational systems then existing, both proponents and opponents of the Amendment understood that it would proscribe all racial segregation in public education.

7. While the Amendment conferred upon Congress the power to enforce its prohibitions, members of the 39th Congress and those of subsequent Congresses made it clear that the framers understood and intended that the Fourteenth Amendment was self-executing and particularly pointed out that the federal judiciary had authority to enforce its prohibitions without Congressional implementation.

8. The evidence as to the understanding of the states is equally convincing. Each of the eleven states that had seceded from the Union ratified the Amendment, and concurrently eliminated racial distinctions from its laws, and adopted a constitution free of requirement or specific authorization of segregated schools. Many rejected proposals for segregated schools, and none enacted a school segregation law until after readmission. The significance of these facts is manifest from the consideration that ten of these states, which were required, as a condition of readmission, to ratify the Amendment and to modify their constitutions and laws in conformity therewith, considered that the Amendment required them to remove all racial distinctions from their existing and prospective laws, including those pertaining to public education.

Twenty-two of the twenty-six Union states also ratified the Amendment. Although unfettered by congressional surveillance, the overwhelming majority of the Union states acted with an understanding that it prohibited racially segregated schools and necessitated conformity of their school laws to secure consistency with that understanding.

9. In short, the historical evidence fully sustains this Court's conclusion in the Slaughter Houses Cases, 16 Wall. 61, 81, that the Fourteenth Amendment was designed to take from the states all power to enforce caste or class distinctions.

10. The Court in its fourth and fifth questions assumes that segregation is declared unconstitutional and inquires as to whether relief should be granted immediately or gradually. Appellants, recognizing the possibility of delay of a purely administrative character, do not ask for the impossible. No cogent reasons justifying further exercise of equitable discretion, however, have as yet been produced.

It has been indirectly suggested in the briefs and oral argument of appellees that some such reasons exist. Two plans were suggested by the United States in its Brief as Amicus Curiae. We have analyzed each of these plans as well as appellees' briefs and oral argument and find nothing there of sufficient merit on which this Court, in the exercise of its equity power, could predicate a decree permitting an effective gradual adjustment from segregated to non-segregated school systems. Nor have we been able to find any other reasons or plans sufficient to warrant the exercise of such equitable discretion in these cases. Therefore, in the present posture of these cases, appellants are unable to suggest any compelling reasons for this Court to postpone relief.

BLEED THROUGH

ARGUMENT

PART ONE

The question of judicial power to abolish segregated schools is basic to the issues involved in these cases and for that reason we have undertaken to analyze it at the outset before dealing with the other matters raised by the Court, although formally this means that the first section of this brief comprehends Question No. 3:

> On the assumption that the answers to question 2(a) and (b) do not dispose of the issue, is it within the judicial power, in construing the Amendment, to abolish segregation in public schools?

I.

Normal exercise of the judicial function calls for a declaration that the state is without power to enforce distinctions based upon race or color in affording educational opportunities in the public schools.

This Court in a long line of decisions has made it plain that the Fourteenth Amendment prohibits a state from making racial distinctions in the exercise of governmental power. Time and again this Court has held that if a state's power has been exercised in such a way as to deprive a Negro of a right which he would have freely enjoyed if he had been white, then that state's action violated the Fourteenth Amendment.

In Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U. S. 1, for example, an unanimous Court held that States of Missouri and Michigan had violated the 14th Amendment when their courts ruled that a Negro could not own real property whose ownership it was admitted the state law would have protected him in, had he been white. This, despite the fact that the state court was doing no more than enforcing a private agreement running with the land. The sole basis for the decision, then, was that the Fourteenth Amendment compels the states to be color blind in exercising their power and authority.

Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U. S. 60, was an earlier decision to the same effect. There, this Court invalidated a Louisville, Kentucky ordinance which required racial residential segregation. Though it applied to Negro and white alike, the Court rightly recognized that the ordinance was an exercise of the state's power based on race and race alone. This, the Court ruled, was a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. To the same effect is Barrows v. Jackson, — U. S. —, 97 L. ed. Advance p. 261). And see Oyama v. California, 332 U. S. 633.

This Court has applied the same rigorous requirement to the exercise of the state's power in providing public education. Beginning with Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, 305 U. S. 337, this Court has uniformly ruled that the Fourteenth Amendment prohibits a state from using race or color as the determinant of the quantum, quality or type of education and the place at which education is to be afforded. Most recently, this Court in McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U. S. 637, held that rules which made distinctions among students in the same school solely on the basis of color were forbidden by the Fourteenth Amendment. Thus, this Court has made it plain that no state may use color or race as the axis upon which the state's power turns, and the conduct of the public education system has not been excepted from this ban.

This judicial recognition that race is an irrational basis for governmental action under our Constitution has been manifested in many decisions and opinions of this Court. In Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, this Court struck down local administrative action which differentiated between whites and Chinese. In Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U. S. 81, 100, Chief Justice Stone, in a majority opinion, characterized racial distinctions as "odious to a free people". In Korematsu v. United States, 323 U. S. 214, 216, the Court viewed racial restrictions as "immediately suspect". Mr. Justice Jackson, concurring in Edwards v. California, 314 U. S. 180, 185, referred to race and color as "constitutionally an irrelevance". Mr. Justice Douglas, dissenting in South v. Peters, 339 U. S. 276, 278, considered discriminations based upon race, creed, or color "beyond the pale". In an unanimous opinion in Henderson v. United States, 339 U. S. 816, 825, the Court, while not reaching the constitutional question raised, described signs, partitions and curtains segregating Negroes in railroad dining cars as emphasizing "the artificiality of a difference in treatment which serves only to call attention to a racial classification of passengers holding identical tickets and using the same public dining facility". Every member of the present Court has from time to time subscribed to this view of race as an irrational premise for government action.

The restrictions placed upon persons of Japanese origin on the West Coast during World War II were sustained in Hirabayashi v. United States, supra, and in Korematsu v. United States, supra, as emergency war measures taken by the national government in a dire national peril of the gravest nature. The military decision was upheld as within an implied war power, and the Court was unwilling to interfere with measures considered necessary to the safety of the nation by those primarily responsible for its security. Yet, in upholding these orders, the Court made some of the most sweeping condemnations of governmentally imposed racial and color distinctions ever announced by our judiciary. And while departure from accepted standards of governmental conduct was sustained in order to remove persons of Japanese origin from areas where sabotage and espionage might have worked havoc with the national war effort, once this removal was accomplished and individual loyalty determined, further restrictions based upon race or color could no longer be countenanced. Ex Parte Endo, 323 U. S. 283.

Tunstall v. Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, 323 U. S. 210, and Steele v. Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co., 323 U. S. 192, while not deciding the constitutional question, left no doubt that the Fifth Amendment had stripped the national government of power to enforce the racial discrimination assailed.

These decisions serve to underscore the constitutional prohibition against Congressional action grounded upon color except in so far as it may have temporary justification to meet an overwhelming national emergency such as that which led to decisions in the Hirabayashi and Korematsu cases.

The power of states is even more rigidly circumscribed. For there is grave doubt that their acts can be sustained under the exception made in the Hirabayashi and Korematsu cases with respect to the national government. See Oyama v. California, 332 U. S. 633. The Fourteenth Amendment has been defined as a broad prohibition against state enforcement of differentiations and discrimination based upon race or color. State action restricting the right of Negroes to vote has been struck down as a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. Nixon v. Condon, 286 U. S. 73. Similarly, the Court has refused to sanction the systematic exclusion of Negroes from the petit or grand jury, Hill v. Texas, 316 U. S. 400; Pierre v. Louisiana, 306 U. S. 354; their representation on juries on a token or proportional basis, Cassell v. Texas, 339 U. S. 282; Shepherd v. Florida, 341 U. S. 50; or any method in the selection of juries susceptible of racial discrimination in practice. Avery v. Georgia, 345 U. S. 559.

Legislation depriving persons of particular races of an opportunity to pursue a gainful occupation has been held a denial of equal protection. Truax v. Raich, 239 U. S. 33; Takahashi v. Fish and Games Commission, 334 U. S. 410. It is now well settled that a state may not make racial differences among its employees the basis for salary differentiations. Alston v. School Board, 112 F. 2d 992 (CA 4th 1940), cert. denied, 311 U. S. 693.

BLEED THROUGH

Indeed, abhorence of race as a premise for governmental action pervades a wide realm of judicial opinion dealing with other constitutional provisions. Sweeping decisions have enforced the right of Negroes to make effective use of the electoral process consistent with the requirements of the Fifteenth Amendment. Guinn v. United States, 238 U. S. 347; Lane v. Wilson, 307 U. S. 268; Smith v. Allwright, 321 U. S. 649; Terry v. Adams, 345 U. S. 461.

It should be added parenthetically that these decisions are not mere pro forma applications of the self-evident requirements of the Fifteenth Amendment. On the contrary, the concept of state action has been utilized in a dynamic and expanding fashion as the Court has sought to reach any method or subterfuge with which the state has attempted to avoid its obligation under that constitutional amendment. Smith v. Allwright, supra; Terry v. Adams, supra. See Rice v. Elmore, 165 F. 2d 387 (CA 4th 1947), cert. denied, 333 U. S. 875 and Baskin v. Brown, 174 F. 2d 391 (CA 4th 1949), cases holding state non-action violative of the Fifteenth Amendment the principle of which was expressly approved in Terry v. Adams.

State laws requiring racial segregation in interstate commerce have been declared an invalid invasion of commerce power reserved to the Congress. Morgan v. Virginia, 328 U. S. 373. But where a state sought to enforce against a carrier engaged in foreign commerce its local non-segregation policy, the state law was upheld. The Court considered it inconceivable that the Congress in the exercise of its plenary power over commerce would take any action in conflict with the local nondiscriminatory regulations imposed. Bob-Lo Excursion Co. v. Michigan, 333 U. S. 28. These two cases considered together strikingly exemplify this Court's position that fundamental national policy is offended by a requirement of segregation, but implemented by its prohibition.

The contention by a labor union that a state civil rights law which prohibited racial discrimination in union membership offended the Fourteenth Amendment was dismissed because such a position "would be a distortion of the policy manifested in that amendment which was adopted to prevent state legislation designed to perpetuate discrimination on the basis of race and color". Railway Mail Association v. Corsi, 326 U. S. 88, 94.

Thus, the Court has all but universally made short shrift of attempts to use governmental power to enforce racial distinctions. Yet, where such power has prohibited racial discrimination, it has been sustained even where it has been urged that the state is acting in derogation of other constitutional rights or protected interests.

At the graduate and professional school level, closest to the cases here, racial distinctions as applied have been struck down. McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U. S. 637; Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629. In those cases the educational process was viewed as a totality. The faculty of the school, the prestige of the institution, the fact that segregation deprived the Negro applicant of the benefits which he might secure in attending school with representatives of the state's dominant racial majority, the value judgment of the community with respect to the segregated school, and the impact of segregation on the individual were among the factors considered by the Court in determining that equal educational opportunities were not available. Those cases, we submit, control disposition of the cases here.

Since segregation was found to impair and inhibit an adult's ability to study in the McLaurin case, it seems clear that such segregation has even more far reaching adverse consequences on the mental development of the children involved here.

Sweatt's isolation from the dominant racial majority in a segregated law school was held to deprive him of an effective opportunity to learn the law. The basic function of the public school is to instruct each succeeding generation in the fundamental traditions of our democracy. The child can best come to believe in and respect these traditions by learning them in a setting in which they are in practical operation. But to be taught that our society is founded upon a concept of equality in a public school from which those racial groups are excluded which hold pre-eminence in every field in his community makes it all but impossible for such teachings to take root. Segregation here is detrimental to the Negro child in his effort to develop into a useful and productive citizen in a democracy.

BLEED THROUGH

The Sweatt and McLaurin cases teach that the Court will consider the educational process in its entirety, including, apart from the measurable physical facilities, whatever factors have been shown to have educational significance. This rule cannot be peculiar to any level of public education. Public elementary and high school education is no less a governmental function than graduate and professional education in state institutions. Moreover, just as Sweatt and McLaurin were denied certain benefits characteristic of graduate and professional education, it is apparent from the records of these cases that Negroes are denied educational benefits which the state itself asserts are the fundamental objectives of public elementary and high school education.

South Carolina, like the other states in this country, has accepted the obligation of furnishing the extensive benefits of public education. Article XI, section 5, of the Constitution of South Carolina, declares: "The General Assembly shall provide for a liberal system of free public schools for all children between the ages of six and twenty-one years". Some 410 pages of the Code of Laws of South Carolina deal with "education". Title 31, Chapters 122-23, S. C. Code, pp. 387-795 (1935). Provision is made for the entire state-supported system of public schools, its administration and organization, from the kindergarten through the university. Pupils and teachers, school buildings, minimum standards of school construction, and specifications requiring certain general courses of instruction are dealt with in detail. In addition to requiring that the three "R's" must be taught, the law compels instruction in "morals and good behaviour" and in the "principles" and "essentials of the United States Constitution, including the study of and devotion to American institutions". Title 31, Chapter 122, sections 5321, 5323, 5325, S. C. Code (1935). The other states involved here are attempting to promote the same objectives.

These states thus recognize the accepted broad purposes of general public education in a democratic society. There is no question that furnishing public education is now an accepted governmental function. There are compelling reasons for a democratic government's assuming the burden of educating its children, of increasing its citizens' usefulness, efficiency and ability to govern.

In a democracy citizens from every group, no matter what their social or economic status or their religious or ethnic origins, are expected to participate widely in the making of important public decisions. The public school, even more than the family, the church, business institutions, political and social groups and other institutions, has become an effective agency for giving to all people that broad background of attitudes and skills required to enable them to function effectively as participants in a democracy. Thus, "education" comprehends the entire process of developing and training the mental, physical and moral powers and capabilities of human beings. See Weyl v. Comm. of Int. Rev., 48 F. 2d 811, 812 (CA 2d 1931); Jones v. Better Business Bureau, 123 F. 2d 767, 769 (CA 10th 1941).

The records in instant cases emphasize the extent to which the state has deprived Negroes of these fundamental educational benefits by separating them from the rest of the school population. In the case of Briggs v. Elliott (No. 101), expert witnesses testified that compulsory racial segregation in elementary and high schools inflicts considerable personal injury on the Negro pupils which endures as long as these students remain in the segregated school. These witnesses testified that compulsory racial segregation in the public schools of South Carolina injures the Negro students by: (1) impairing their ability to learn (R. 140, 161); (2) deterring the development of their personalities (R. 86, 89); (3) depriving them of equal status in the school community (R. 89, 141, 145); (4) destroying their self-respect (R. 140, 148); (5) denying them full opportunity for democratic social development (R. 98, 99, 103); (6) subjecting them to the prejudices of others (R. 133) and stamping them with a badge of inferiority (R. 148).

Similar testimony was introduced in each of the other three cases here involved, and that testimony was undisputed in the case of Briggs v. Elliott (No. 101); Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, et al. (No. 8); Gebhart v. Belton (No. 448). In Davis v. County School Board (No. 191), while witnesses for the appellees disputed portions of the testimony of appellants' expert witnesses, four of appellees' witnesses admitted that racial segregation has harmful effects and another recognized that such segregation could be injurious.

In the Gebhart case (No. 448) the Chancellor filed an opinion in which he set forth a finding of fact, based on the undisputed oral testimony of experts in education, sociology, psychology, psychiatry and anthropology (A. 340-341) that in "our Delaware society", segregation in education practiced by petitioners as agents of the state "itself results in the Negro children, as a class, receiving educational opportunities which are substantially inferior to those available to white children otherwise similarly situated".

And the court below in the Brown case (No. 8) made the following Finding of Fact (R. 245-246):

> "Segregation of white and colored children in public schools has a detrimental effect upon the colored chil> dren. The impact is greater when it has the sanction of the law; for the policy of separating the races is usually interpreted as denoting the inferiority of the negro group. A sense of inferiority affects the motivation of a child to learn. Segregation with the sanction of law, therefore, has a tendency to retard the educational and mental development of negro children and to deprive them of some of the benefits they would receive in a racially integrated school system."

The testimony of the expert witnesses in the cases now under consideration, the Opinion of the Chancellor in the Delaware case and the Finding of Fact by the lower court in the Kansas case are amply supported by scientific studies of recognized experts. A compilation of these materials was assembled and filed as an Appendix to the briefs in these cases on the first hearing. The observation of Mr. Justice Jackson in West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U. S. 624, 636 that public school children, being educated for citizenship, must be scrupulously protected in their constitutional rights, "if we are not to strangle the free mind at its source and teach youth to discount important principles of our government as mere platitudes", while made in somewhat different context, appropriately describes the high public interest which these cases involve.

In sum, the statutes and constitutional provisions assailed in these cases must fall because they are contrary to this Court's basic premise that, as a matter of law, race is not an allowable basis of differentiation in governmental action; they are inconsistent with the broad prohibition of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments as defined by this Court; they are clearly within that category of racism in state action specifically prohibited by the McLaurin and Sweatt decisions.

BLEED THROUGH

II.

The statutory and constitutional provisions involved in these cases cannot be validated under any separate but equal concept.

The basic principles referred to in Point I above, we submit, control these cases, and except for the mistaken belief that the doctrine of Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537, is a correct expression of the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment, these cases would present no difficult problem.

This Court announced the separate but equal doctrine in a transportation case, and proponents of segregation have relied upon it repeatedly as a justification for racial segregation as if "separate but equal" had become in haec verba an amendment to the Fourteenth Amendment, itself. Under that anomalous doctrine, it is said that racial differentiations in the enjoyment of rights protected by the Fourteenth Amendment are permitted as long as the segregated facilities provided for Negroes are substantially equal to those provided for other racial groups. In each case in this Court where a state scheme of racism has been deemed susceptible of rationalization under the separate but equal formula, it has been urged as a defense.

A careful reading of the cases, however, reveals that this doctrine has received only very limited and restricted application in the actual decisions of this Court, and even that support has been eroded by more recent decisions. See particularly McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents; Sweatt v. Painter. Whatever appeal the separate but equal doctrine might have had, it stands mirrored today as the faulty conception of an era dominated by provincialism, by intense emotionalism in race relations caused by local and temporary conditions and by the preaching of a doctrine of racial superiority that contradicted the basic concept upon which our society was founded. Twentieth century America, fighting racism at home and abroad, has rejected the race views of Plessy v. Ferguson because we have come to the realization that such views obviously tend to preserve not the strength but the weaknesses of our heritage.

A. Racial Segregation Cannot Be Squared With the Rationale of the Early Cases Interpreting the Reach of the Fourteenth Amendment.

In the Slaughter House Cases, 16 Wall. 36—the first case decided under the Fourteenth Amendment—the Court, drawing on its knowledge of an almost contemporaneous event, recognized that the Fourteenth Amendment secured to Negroes full citizenship rights and prohibited any state action discriminating against them as a class on account of their race. Thus, addressing itself to the intent of the Thirteenth, Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, the Court said at pages 71 and 72:

> "We repeat, then, in the light of this recapitulation of events, almost too recent to be called history, but which are familiar to us all; and on the most casual examination of the language of these amendments, no one can fail to be impressed with the one pervading purpose found in them all, lying at the foundation of each, and without which none of them would have been even suggested; we mean the freedom of the slave race, the security and firm establishment of that freedom, and the protection of the newly made freeman and citizen from the oppressions of those who had formerly exercised unlimited dominion over him. It is true that only the 15th Amendment, in terms, mentions the negro by speaking of his color and his slavery. But it is just as true that each of the other articles was addressed to the grievances of that race, and designed to remedy them as the fifteenth."

The real purpose of the equal protection clause was discussed in these terms at page 81:

> "In the light of the history of these amendments, and the pervading purpose of them, which we have > already discussed, it is not difficult to give a meaning to this clause. The existence of laws in the states where the newly emancipated negroes resided, which discriminated with gross injustice and hardship against them as a class, was the evil to be remedied by this clause, and by it such laws are forbidden." (Emphasis supplied).

BLEED THROUGH

So convinced was the Court that the overriding purpose of the Fourteenth Amendment was to protect the Negro against discrimination that it declared further at page 81:

> "We doubt very much whether any action of a state not directed by way of discrimination against the negroes as a class, or on account of their race, will ever be held to come within the purview of this provision. It is so clearly a provision for that race and that emergency, that a strong case would be necessary for its application to any other."

In Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U. S. 303, the Court, on page 306, viewed the Fourteenth Amendment in the same light and stated that its enactment was aimed to secure for the Negro all the civil rights enjoyed by white persons:

> "It was in view of these considerations the 14th Amendment was framed and adopted. It was designed to assure to the colored race the enjoyment of all the civil rights that under the law are enjoyed by white persons, and to give to that race the protection of the General Government, in that enjoyment, whenever it should be denied by the States. It not only gave citizenship and the privileges of citizenship to persons of color, but it denied to any State the power to withhold from them the equal protection of the laws, and authorized Congress to enforce its provisions by appropriate legislation." (Emphasis supplied).

Clearly recognizing the need to construe the Amendment liberally in order to protect the Negro, the Court noted at page 307:

> "If this is the spirit and meaning of the Amendment, whether it means more or not, it is to be construed liberally, to carry out the purposes of its framers. It ordains that no State shall make or enforce any laws which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States (evidently referring to the newly made citizens, who, being citizens of the United States, are declared to be also citizens of the State in which they reside)."

It was explicitly stated at pages 307, 308 that the Amendment prevented laws from distinguishing between colored and white persons:

> "What is this but declaring that the law in the States shall be the same for the black as for the white; that all persons, whether colored or white, shall stand equal before the laws of the States and, in regard to the colored race, for whose protection the Amendment was primarily designed, that no discrimination shall be made against them by law because of their color? The words of the Amendment, it is true, are prohibitory, but they contain a necessary implication of a positive immunity, or right, most valuable to the colored race—the right to exemption from unfriendly legislation against them distinctly as colored; exemption from legal discriminations, implying inferiority in civil society, lessening the security of their enjoyment of the rights which others enjoy, and discriminations which are steps towards reducing them to the condition of a subject race." (Emphasis supplied).

Any distinction based upon race was understood as constituting a badge of inferiority, at page 308:

> "The very fact that colored people are singled out and expressly denied by a statute all right to participate in the administration of the law, as jurors, because of their color, though they are citizens and may be in other respects fully qualified, is practically a brand upon them, affixed by the law; an assertion of their inferiority, and a stimulant to that race preju> dice which is an impediment to securing to individuals of the race that equal justice which the law aims to secure to all others."

BLEED THROUGH

There was no doubt that this new constitutional provision had changed the relationship between the federal government and the states so that the federal courts could and should now protect these new rights. At page 309 the Court said:

> "The framers of the constitutional Amendment must have known full well the existence of such prejudice and its likelihood to continue against the manumitted slaves and their race, and that knowledge was, doubtless, a motive that led to the Amendment. By their manumission and citizenship the colored race became entitled to the equal protection of the laws of the States in which they resided; and the apprehension that, through prejudice, they might be denied that equal protection, that is, that there might be discrimination against them, was the inducement to bestow upon the National Government the power to enforce the provision that no State shall deny to them the equal protection of the laws. Without the apprehended existence of prejudice that portion of the Amendment would have been unnecessary, and it might have been left to the States to extend equality of protection."

That law must not distinguish between colored and white persons was the thesis of all the early cases. United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 542, 554, 555; Virginia v. Rives, 100 U. S. 313; Ex Parte Virginia, 100 U. S. 339; Neal v. Delaware, 103 U. S. 370, 386; Bush v. Kentucky, 107 U. S. 110; Civil Rights Cases, 109 U. S. 3, 36, 43. As early as Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, it became settled doctrine that the Fourteenth Amendment was a broad prohibition against state enforcement of racial differentiations or discrimination—a prohibition totally at war with any separate but equal notion. There can be no doubt, we submit, that, had the state regulation approved in Plessy v. Fergu- son been before the Court that rendered the initial interpretations of the Fourteenth Amendment, the regulation would have been held a violation of the Federal Constitution.

B. The First Time the Question Came Before the Court, Racial Segregation In Transportation Was Specifically Disapproved.

In Railroad Co. v. Brown, 17 Wall. 445, the first case involving the validity of segregation to reach this Court after the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment, segregation was struck down as an unlawful discrimination. While the Fourteenth Amendment was not before the Court, the decision in the Brown case was in line with the spirit of the new status that the Negro had gained under the Thirteenth, Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments.

The problem before the Court concerned the validity of the carrier's rules and regulations that sought to segregate its passengers because of race. The pertinent facts are described by the Court as follows at page 451:

> "In the enforcement of this regulation, the defendant in error, a person of color, having entered a car appropriated to white ladies, was requested to leave it and take a seat in another car used for colored persons. This she refused to do, and this refusal resulted in her ejectment by force and with insult from the car she had first entered."

The Court characterized the railroad's defense that its practice of providing separate accommodations for Negroes was valid, as an ingenious attempt at evasion, at page 452:

> "The plaintiff in error contends that it has literally obeyed the direction, because it has never excluded this class of persons from the cars, but on the contrary, has always provided accommodations for them.
>
> "This is an ingenious attempt to evade a compliance with the obvious meaning of the requirement. It is true the words taken literally might bear the > interpretation put upon them by the plaintiff in error, but evidently Congress did not use them in any such limited sense. There was no occasion, in legislating for a railroad corporation, to annex a condition to a grant of power, that the company should allow colored persons to ride in its cars. This right had never been refused, nor could there have been in the mind of anyone an apprehension that such a state of things would ever occur, for self-interest would clearly induce the carrier—South as well as North—to transport, if paid for it, all persons whether white or black, who should desire transportation."

BLEED THROUGH

The Court stressed with particularity the fact that the discrimination prohibited was discrimination in the use of the cars, at pages 452-453:

> "It was the discrimination in the use of the cars on account of color, where slavery obtained, which was the subject of discussion at the time, and not the fact that the colored race could not ride in the cars at all. Congress, in the belief that this discrimination was unjust, acted. It told this company, in substance, that it could extend its road in the District as desired, but that this discrimination must cease, and the colored and white race, in the use of the cars, be placed on an equality. This condition it had the right to impose, and in the temper of Congress at the time, it is manifest the grant could not have been made without it."

The regulation that was struck down in the Brown case sought to accomplish exactly what was achieved under a state statute upheld subsequently in Plessy v. Ferguson—the segregation of Negro and white passengers. It is clear, therefore, that in this earlier decision the Court considered segregation per se discrimination and a denial of equality.

C. The Separate But Equal Doctrine Marked An Unwarranted Departure From the Main Stream of Constitutional Development and Permits the Frustration of the Very Purposes of The Fourteenth Amendment As Defined by This Court.

In Plessy v. Ferguson, this Court for the first time gave approval to state imposed racial distinctions as consistent with the purposes and meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court described the aims and purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment in the same manner as had the earlier cases, at page 543:

> ". . . its main purpose was to establish the citizenship of the negro; to give definitions of citizenship of the United States and of the states, and to protect from the hostile legislation of the states the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, as distinguished from those of citizens of the states."

But these defined aims and purposes were now considered consistent with the imposition of legal distinctions based upon race. The Court said at 544, 551-552:

> "The object of the amendment was undoubtedly to enforce the absolute equality of the two races before the law, but in the nature of things it could not have been intended to abolish distinctions based upon color, or to enforce social, as distinguished from political, equality, or a commingling of the two races upon terms unsatisfactory to either.
>
> • • •
>
> Legislation is powerless to eradicate racial instincts or to abolish distinctions based upon physical differences, and the attempt to do so can only result in accentuating the difficulties of the present situation. If the civil and political rights of both races be equal, one cannot be inferior to the other civilly or politically. If one race be inferior to the other socially, the Constitution of the United States cannot put them upon the same plane."

BLEED THROUGH

And reasonableness of the regulation was found in established social usage, custom and tradition, at page 550:

> "So far, then, as a conflict with the 14th Amendment is concerned, the case reduces itself to the question whether the statute of Louisiana is a reasonable regulation and with respect to this there must necessarily be a large discretion on the part of the legislature. In determining the question of reasonableness it is at liberty to act with reference to the established usages, customs, and traditions of the people, and with a view to the promotion of their comfort, and the preservation of the public peace and good order."

In Plessy, through distortion of the concept of "social" rights as distinguished from "civil" rights, the right to civil equality as one of the purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment was given a restricted meaning wholly at variance with that of the earlier cases and the intent of the framers as defined by this Court. Indeed, civil rights, as defined by that Court, seem merely to encompass those rights attendant upon use of the legal process and protection against complete exclusion pursuant to state mandate. Race for the first time since the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment was sanctioned as a constitutionally valid basis for state action, and reasonableness for the racial distinctions approved was found in the social customs, usages and traditions of a people only thirty-one years removed from a slave society.

Under this rationale the Court sought to square its approval of racial segregation with the Slaughter House Cases, Strauder v. West Virginia and the other precedents. It is clear, however, that the early cases interpreted the Fourteenth Amendment as encompassing that same category of rights which were involved in Plessy v. Ferguson—the right to be free of a racial differentiation imposed by the state in the exercise of any civil right. And the Court's attempt to distinguish Railroad Co. v. Brown, as a case of exclusion, was the very argument that has been specifically rejected in the Brown case as a sophisticated effort to avoid the obvious implications of the Congressional requirement. Thus, the separate but equal doctrine is a rejection of the precedents and constitutes a break in the development of constitutional law under which the Fourteenth Amendment has been interpreted as a fundamental interdiction against state imposed differentiations and discriminations based upon color.

D. The Separate But Equal Doctrine Was Conceived in Error.

The separate but equal doctrine of Plessy v. Ferguson, we submit, has aided and supported efforts to nullify the Fourteenth Amendment's undoubted purpose—equal status for Negroes—as defined again and again by this Court. The fallacious and pernicious implications of the doctrine were evident to Justice Harlan and are set out in his dissenting opinion. It is clear today that the fact that racial segregation accords with custom and usage or is considered needful for the preservation of public peace and good order does not suffice to give constitutional validity to the state's action. What the doctrine has in fact accomplished is to deprive Negroes of the protection of the approved test of reasonable classifications which is available to everyone else who challenges legislative categories or distinctions of whatever kind.

1. The Dissenting Opinion of Justice Harlan in Plessy v. Ferguson.

Justice Harlan recognized and set down for history the purpose of segregation and the implications of the separate but equal doctrine and evidenced prophetic insight concerning the inevitable consequences of the Court's approval of racial segregation. He said at page 557: "The thing to accomplish was, under the guise of giving equal accommodations for whites and blacks to compel the latter to keep to themselves while traveling in railroad passenger coaches."

BLEED THROUGH

He realized at page 560, moreover, that the approved regulations supported the inferior caste thesis of Scott v. Sandford, 19 How. 393, supposedly eradicated by the Civil War Amendments: "But it seems that we have yet, in some of the states, a dominant race, a superior class of citizens, which assumes to regulate the enjoyment of civil rights, common to all citizens, on the basis of race." And at page 562: "We boast of the freedom enjoyed by our people above all other people. But it is difficult to reconcile that boast with a state of the law which, practically, puts the brand of servitude and degradation upon a large class of our fellow citizens, our equals before the law."

While the majority opinion sought to rationalize its holding on the basis of the state's judgment that separation of races was conducive to public peace and order, Justice Harlan knew all too well that the seeds for continuing racial animosities had been planted. He said at pages 560-561:

> "The sure guaranty of peace and security of each race is the clear, distinct, unconditional recognition by our governments, national and state, of every right that inheres in civil freedom, and of equality before the law of all citizens of the United States without regard to race. State enactments, regulating the enjoyment of civil rights, upon the basis of race, and cunningly devised to defeat legitimate results of the war, under the pretense of recognizing equality of rights, can have no other result than to render permanent peace impossible and to keep alive a conflict of races, the continuance of which must do harm to all concerned."

"Our Constitution", said Justice Harlan at 559, "is color-blind, and neither knows nor tolerates classes among citizens." It is the dissenting opinion of Justice Harlan, rather than the majority opinion in Plessy v. Ferguson, that is in keeping with the scope and meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment as consistently defined by this Court both before and after Plessy v. Ferguson.

2. Custom, Usage and Tradition Rooted in the Slave Tradition Cannot Be the Constitutional Yardstick for Measuring State Action Under the Fourteenth Amendment.

The analysis by Justice Harlan of the bases for the majority opinion in Plessy v. Ferguson was adopted by this Court in Chiles v. Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad Company, 218 U. S. 71, 77, 78. There this Court cited Plessy v. Ferguson as authority for sustaining the validity of legislative distinctions based upon race and color alone.

The importance of this case is its clear recognition and understanding that in Plessy v. Ferguson this Court approved the enforcement of racial distinctions as reasonable because they are in accordance with established social usage, custom and tradition. The Court said at pages 77, 78:

> "It is true the power of a legislature to recognize a racial distinction was the subject considered, but if the test of reasonableness in legislation be, as it was declared to be, 'the established usages, customs and traditions of the people,' and the 'promotion of their comfort and the preservation of the public peace and good order,' this must also be the test of reasonableness of the regulations of a carrier, made for like purposes and to secure like results."

But the very purpose of the Thirteenth, Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments was to effectuate a complete break with governmental action based on the established usages, customs and traditions of the slave era, to revolutionize the legal relationship between Negroes and whites, to destroy the inferior status of the Negro and to place him upon a plane of complete equality with the white man. As we will demonstrate, post Civil War reestablishment of ante-bellum custom and usage, climaxed by the decision in Plessy v. Ferguson, reflected a constant effort to return the Negro to his pre-Thirteenth, Fourteenth Amendment inferior status.

BLEED THROUGH

When the Court employed the old usages, customs and traditions as the basis for determining the reasonableness of segregation statutes designed to resubjugate the Negro to an inferior status, it nullified the acknowledged intention of the framers of the Amendment, and made a travesty of the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Here, again, the Plessy v. Ferguson decision is out of line with the modern holdings of this Court, for in a variety of cases involving the rights of Negroes it has constantly refused to regard custom and usage, however widespread, as determinative of reasonableness. This was true in Smith v. Allwright, of a deeply entrenched custom and usage of excluding Negroes from voting in the primaries. It was true in Shelley v. Kraemer, of a long standing custom excluding Negroes from the use and ownership of real property on the basis of race. In Henderson v. United States, a discriminatory practice of many years was held to violate the Interstate Commerce Act. In the Sweatt and McLaurin decisions, the Court broke a southern tradition of state-enforced racial distinctions in graduate and professional education—a custom almost as old as graduate and professional education, itself.

In each instance the custom and usage had persisted for generations and its durability was cited as grounds for its validity. If this were the only test, ours indeed would become a stagnant society. Even if there be some situations in which custom, usage and tradition may be considered in testing the reasonableness of governmental action, customs, traditions and usages rooted in slavery cannot be worthy of the constitutional sanction of this Court.

3. Preservation of Public Peace Cannot Justify Deprivation of Constitutional Rights.

The fallacy underlying Plessy v. Ferguson of justifying racially-discriminatory statutes as essential to the public peace and good order has been completely exposed by

Frederick W. Lehmann, a former Solicitor General of the United States, and Wells H. Blodgett in their Brief as amici curiae in Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U. S. 60. Their statements warrant repetition here:

> "The implication of the title of the ordinance is, that unless the white and colored people live in separate blocks, ill feeling will be engendered between them and conflicts will result and so it is assumed that a segregation of the races is necessary for the preservation of the public peace and the promotion of the general welfare. There is evidence in the record that prior to the enactment of the ordinance there were instances of colored people moving into white blocks and efforts by the white people to drive them out by violence. So to preserve the peace, the ordinance was enacted not to repress the lawless violence, but to give the sanction of the law to the motives which inspired it and to make the purpose of it lawful.
>
> "The population of Louisville numbers two hundred and fifty thousand, of whom about one-fifth are colored. The ordinance, almost upon its face, and clearly by the evidence submitted and the arguments offered in support of it is a discriminating enactment by the dominant majority against a minority who are held to be an inferior people. It cannot be justified by the recitals of the title, even if they are true. Many things may rouse a man's prejudice or stir him to anger, but he is not always to be humored in his wrath. The question may arise, 'Dost thou well to be angry?'" (Brief Amici Curiae, pp. 2 and 3).

Accepting this view, the Court in Buchanan v. Warley rejected the argument that a state could deny constitutional rights with impunity in its efforts to maintain the public peace:

> "It is urged that this proposed segregation will promote the public peace by preventing race conflicts. Desirable as this is, and important as is the preservation of the public peace, this aim cannot be > accomplished by laws or ordinances which deny rights created or protected by the Federal Constitution" (245 U. S. 60, 81).

Accord, Morgan v. Virginia, supra; Monk v. City of Birmingham, 185 F. 2d 859 (CA 5th 1950), cert. denied, 341 U. S. 940.

Thus, the bases upon which the separate but equal doctrine was approved in the Plessy v. Ferguson case have all been uprooted by subsequent decisions of this Court. All that remains is the naked doctrine itself, unsupported by reason, contrary to the intent of the framers, and out of tune with present notions of constitutional rights. Repudiation of the doctrine itself, we submit, is long overdue.

4. The Separate but Equal Doctrine Deprives Negroes of That Protection Which the Fourteenth Amendment Accords Under the General Classification Test.

One of the ironies of the separate but equal doctrine of Plessy v. Ferguson is that under it, the Fourteenth Amendment, the primary purpose of which was the protection of Negroes, is construed as encompassing a narrower area of protection for Negroes than for other persons under the general classification test.

Early in its history, the Fourteenth Amendment was construed as reaching not only state action based upon race and color, but also as prohibiting all unreasonable classifications and distinctions even though not racial in character. Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, seems to be the earliest case to adopt this concept of the Amendment. There the Court said on page 31:

> "The Fourteenth Amendment . . . undoubtedly intended, not only that there should be no arbitrary deprivation of life or liberty or arbitrary spoliation of property but that equal protection and security should be given to all under like circumstances in the enjoyment of their personal and civil rights."

Accord: Minneapolis & St. Louis Ry. Co. v. Beckwith, 129 U. S. 26, 28, 29; Bell's Gap R. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 134 U. S. 232, 237; McPherson v. Blacker, 146 U. S. 1, 39; Yesler v. Board of Harbor Line Commissioners, 146 U. S. 646, 655; Giozza v. Tiernan, 148 U. S. 657, 662; Marchant v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 153 U. S. 380, 390; Moore v. Missouri, 159 U. S. 673, 678.

In effectuating the protection afforded by this secondary purpose, the Court has required the classification or distinction used be based upon some real or substantial difference pertinent to a valid legislative objective. E.g., Quaker City Cab Co. v. Pennsylvania, 277 U. S. 389; Truax v. Raich, 239 U. S. 33; Smith v. Cahoon, 283 U. S. 553; Mayflower Farms v. Ten Eyck, 297 U. S. 266; Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U. S. 535. See also Cities Service Gas Co. v. Peerless Oil & Gas Co., 340 U. S. 179, 186.

Justice Holmes in Nixon v. Herndon, 273 U. S. 536, 541, recognized and restated a long established and well settled judicial proposition when he described the Fourteenth Amendment's prohibition against unreasonable legislative classification as less rigidly proscriptive of state action than the Amendment's prohibition of color differentiation. There he concluded:

> "States may do a good deal of classifying that it is difficult to believe rational, but there are limits, and it is too clear for extended argument that color cannot be made the basis of a statutory classification affecting the right set up in this case."

But the separate but equal doctrine substitutes race for reasonableness as the constitutional test of classification. We submit, it would be a distortion of the purposes and intendment of the Fourteenth Amendment to deny to those persons for whose benefit that provision was primarily intended the same measure of protection afforded by a rule of construction evolved to reach the Amendment's subsidiary and secondary objectives. We urge this Court to examine the segregation statutes in these cases to determine whether the statutes seek to serve a permissible legislative objective; and, if any permissible objective is found, whether color differentiation has pertinence to it. So examined, the constitutional provisions and statutes involved here disclose unmistakably their constitutional infirmity.

E. The Separate But Equal Doctrine Has Not Received Unqualified Approval in This Court.

Even while the separate but equal doctrine was evolving, this Court imposed limitations upon its applications. In Buchanan v. Warley, the Court, after reviewing the limited acceptance which the doctrine had received, concluded that its extension to approve state enforced segregation in housing was not permissible.

Ten years later in Gong Lum v. Rice, 275 U. S. 78, 85, 86, without any intervening development in the doctrine in this Court, sweeping language was used which gave the erroneous impression that this Court already had extended the application of the doctrine to the field of education. And in Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, 305 U. S. 337, the doctrine is mentioned in passing as if its application to public education were well established. But, what Justice Day was careful to point out in Buchanan v. Warley, was true then and is true now—the separate but equal doctrine has never been extended by this Court beyond the field of transportation in any case where such extension was contested.

While the doctrine itself has not been specifically repudiated as a valid constitutional yardstick in the field of public education, in cases in which this Court has had to determine whether the state had performed its constitutional obligation to provide equal education opportunities—the question presented here—the separate but equal doctrine has never been used by this Court to sustain the validity of the state's separate school laws. Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada; Sipuel v. Board of Regents, 332 U. S. 631; Sweatt v. Painter; McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents.

Earlier educational cases, not concerned with equality, did not apply the doctrine. In Cumming v. County Board of Education, 175 U. S. 528, the question was explicitly beyond the scope of the decision rendered. In Berea College v. Kentucky, 211 U. S. 45, the question was reserved. In Gong Lum v. Rice, the separate but equal doctrine was not put in issue. Instead of challenging the validity of the Mississippi school segregation laws, the Chinese child merely objected to being classified as a Negro for public school purposes.

Even in the field of transportation, subsequent decisions have sapped the doctrine of vitality. Henderson v. United States in effect overruled Chiles v. Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Co., 218 U. S. 71. See Chance v. Lambeth, 186 F. 2d 879 (CA 4th 1951), cert. denied, 341 U. S. 91. Morgan v. Virginia places persons traveling in interstate commerce beyond the thrust of state segregation statutes. Thus, the reach of the separate but equal doctrine approved in the Plessy case has now been so severely restricted and narrowed in scope that, it may be appropriately said of Plessy v. Ferguson as it was said of Crowell v. Benson, 285 U. S. 22, "one had supposed that the doctrine had earned a deserved repose." Estep v. United States, 327 U. S. 114, 142 (concurring opinion).

F. The Necessary Consequence of the Sweatt and McLaurin Decisions is Repudiation of the Separate But Equal Doctrine.

While Sweatt v. Painter and McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents were not in terms rejections of the separate but equal doctrine, their application in effect destroyed the practice of segregation with respect to state graduate and professional schools. Wilson v. Board of Supervisors, 92 F. Supp. 986 (E. D. La. 1950), aff'd, 340 U. S. 909; Gray v. Board of Trustees of University of Tennessee, 342 U. S. 517; McKissick v. Carmichael, 187 F. 2d 949 (CA 4th 1951), cert. denied, 341 U. S. 951; Swanson v. University of Virginia, Civil Action #30 (W. D. Va. 1950) unreported;

Payne v. Board of Supervisors, Civil Action #894 (E. D. La. 1952) unreported; Foister v. Board of Supervisors, Civil Action #937 (E. D. La. 1952) unreported; Mitchell v. Board of Regents of University of Maryland, Docket #16, Folio 126 (Baltimore City Court 1950) unreported.[1]

In the Sweatt case, the Court stated that, with members of the state's dominant racial groups excluded from the segregated law school which the state sought to require Sweatt to attend, "we cannot conclude that the education offered petitioner is substantially equal to that he would receive if admitted to the University of Texas." If this consideration is one of the controlling factors in determining substantial equality at the law school level, it is impossible for any segregated law school to be an equal law school. And pursuant to that decision one of the oldest and best state-supported segregated law schools in the country was found unequal and Negro applicants were ordered admitted to the University of North Carolina. McKissick v. Carmichael. Thus, substantial equality in professional education is "substantially equal" only if there is no racial segregation.

In the McLaurin case, the racial distinctions imposed in an effort to comply with the state's segregation laws were held to impair and inhibit ability to study, to exchange views with other students and, in general, to learn one's

III.

Viewed in the light of history the separate but equal doctrine has been an instrumentality of defiant nullification of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The history of segregation laws reveals that their main purpose was to organize the community upon the basis of a superior white and an inferior Negro caste. These laws were conceived in a belief in the inherent inferiority of Negroes, a concept taken from slavery. Inevitably, segregation in its operation and effect has meant inequality consistent only with the belief that the people segregated are inferior and not worthy, or capable, of enjoying the facilities set apart for the dominant group.

Segregation originated as a part of an effort to build a social order in which the Negro would be placed in a status as close as possible to that he had held before the Civil War. The separate but equal doctrine furnished a base from which those who sought to nullify the Thirteenth, Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments were permitted to operate in relative security. While this must have been apparent at the end of the last century, the doctrine has become beclouded with so much fiction that it becomes important to consider the matter in historical context to restore a proper view of its meaning and import.

A. The Status of the Negro, Slave and Free, Prior to the Civil War.

One of the basic assumptions of the slave system was the Negro's inherent inferiority.[2] As the invention of the cotton gin rendered slavery essential to the maintenance of the plantation economy in the South, a body of pseudo-scientific thought developed in passionate defense of slavery, premised on the Negro's unfitness for freedom and equality.[3] Thus, the Negro's inferiority with respect to brain capacity, lung activity and countless other physiological attributes was purportedly established by some of the South's most respected scientists.[4] In all relationships between the two races the Negro's place was that of an inferior, for it was claimed that any other relationship status would automatically degrade the white man.[5]

This concept of the Negro as an inferior fit only for slavery was complicated by the presence of several hundred thousand Negroes, who although not slaves, could not be described as free men.[6] In order that they would not constitute a threat to the slave regime, free Negroes were denied the full rights and privileges of citizens. They enjoyed no equality in the courts, their right to assemble was denied, their movements were proscribed, and education was withheld.[7] Their plight, in consequence of these proscriptions, invited the unfavorable comparison of them with slaves and confirmed the views of many that Negroes could not profit by freedom. They were regarded by the white society as the "very drones and pests of society," pariahs of the land, and an incubus on the body politic.[8] Even this Court, in Scott v. Sanford, recognized this substantial body of opinion to the effect that free Negroes had no rights that a white man was bound to respect.

The few privileges that free Negroes enjoyed were being constantly whittled away in the early nineteenth century. By 1836, free Negroes were denied the ballot in every southern state and in many states outside the South.[9] In some states, they were denied residence on penalty of enslavement; and in some, they were banned from the mechanical trades because of the economic pressure upon the white artisans.[10] Before the outbreak of the Civil War, the movement to reenslave free Negroes was under way in several states in the South.[11]

This ante-bellum view of the inferiority of the Negro persisted after the Civil War among those who already regarded the newly freed slaves as simply augmenting the group of free Negroes who had been regarded as "the most ignorant . . . vicious, improverished, and degraded population of this country." [12]

B. The Post War Struggle.

The slave system had supported and sustained a plantation economy under which 1,000 families received approximately $50,000,000 a year with the remaining 600,000 families receiving about $60,000,000 per annum. The perfection of that economy meant the ruthless destruction of the small independent white farmer who was either bought out or driven back to the poorer lands—the slaveholders controlled the destiny of both the slave and the poor whites.[13] Slaves were not only farmers and unskilled laborers but were trained by their masters as skilled artisans. Thus, slave labor was in formidable competition with white labor at every level, and the latter was the more expendable for it did not represent property and investment. Only a few white supervisory persons were needed to insure the successful operation of the plantation system.

After the Civil War, the independent white farmer entered into cotton cultivation and took over the lands of the now impracticable large plantations. Within a few years the independent farmer was engaged in 40% of the cotton cultivation, and by 1910 this percentage had risen to 67%.[14] To the poor white Southerner the new Negro, as a skilled farmer and artisan in a free competitive economy, loomed as an even greater economic menace than he had been under the slave system. They became firm advocates of the Negro's subjugation to insure their own economic well being.[15]

The plantation aristocracy sought to regain their economic and political pre-eminence by rebuilding the pre-war social structure on the philosophy of the Negro's inferiority. This group found that they could build a new economic structure based upon a depressed labor market of poor whites and Negroes. Thus, to the aristocracy, too, the Negro's subjugation was an economic advantage.

The mutual concern of these two groups of white Southerners for the subjugation of the Negro gave them a common basis for unity in irreconcilable resistance to the revolutionary change in the Negro's status which the Civil War Amendments were designed to effect. Their attitude towards the Fourteenth Amendment is best described by a Mississippi editor who said that the southern states were not prepared "to become parties to their own degradation."[16] There were white southerners, however, as there always had been, who sought to build a society which would respect and dignify the rights of the Freedmen. But this group was in the minority and southern sentiment in bitter opposition to Negro equality prevailed. Accordingly, as a temporary expedient, even as an army of occupation has been necessary recently in Germany and Japan to prevent lawlessness by irreconcilables and the recrudescense of totalitarianism, so Union forces were needed during Reconstruction to maintain order and to make possible the development of a more democratic way of life in the states recently in rebellion.

The Thirteenth, Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments and the Reconstruction effort, implemented by those in the South who were coming to accept the new concept of the Negro as a free man on full terms of equality, could have led to a society free of racism. The possibility of the extensive establishment and expansion of mixed schools was real at this stage. It was discussed in every southern state, and in most states serious consideration was given to the proposal to establish them.[17]

[17] KNIGHT, PUBLIC EDUCATION IN THE SOUTH 320 (1922). See also Part II infra, at pages 142-157.

There were interracial colleges, academies, and tributary grammar schools in the South established and maintained largely by philanthropic societies and individuals from the North. Although they were predominantly Negro institutions, in the Reconstruction period and later, institutions such as Fisk University in Nashville, Tennessee, and Talladega College in Alabama usually had some white students. In the last quarter of the nineteenth century most of the teachers in these institutions were white. For accounts of co-racial education at Joppa Institute and Nat School in Alabama, Piedmont College in Georgia, Saluda Institute in North Carolina and in other southern schools, see BROWNLEE, NEW DAY ASCENDING 98-110 (1946).

The effect of these institutions in keeping alive the possibility of Negroes and whites living and learning together on the basis of complete equality was pointed out by one of the South's most distinguished men of letters, George W. Cable. "In these institutions," he said:

> "... there is a complete ignoring of those race distinctions in the enjoyment of common public rights so religiously enforced on every side beyond their borders; and yet none of those unnamable disasters have come to or from them which the advocates of these onerous public distinctions and separations predict and dread. On scores of Southern hilltops these schools stand out almost totally without companions or competitors in their peculiar field, so many refutations, visible and complete, of the idea that any interest requires the colored American citizen to be limited in any of the civil rights that would be his without question if the same man were white."

C. The Compromise of 1877 and the Abandonment of Reconstruction.

The return to power of the southern irreconcilables was finally made possible by rapproachement between northern and southern economic interests culminating in the compromise of 1877. In the North, control of the Republican Party passed to those who believed that the protection and expansion of their economic power could best be served by political conciliation of the southern irreconcilables, rather than by unswerving insistence upon human equality and the rights guaranteed by the post war Amendments. In the 1870's those forces that held fast to the notion of the Negro's preordained inferiority returned to power in state after state, and it is significant that one of the first measures adopted was to require segregated schools on a permanent basis in disregard of the Fourteenth Amendment.[18]

In 1877, out of the exigencies of a close and contested election, came a bargain between the Republican Party and the southern leaders of the Democratic Party which assured President Hayes' election, led to the withdrawal of federal troops from the non-redeemed states and left the South free to solve the Negro problem without apparent [18] Georgia, where the reconstruction government was especially short-lived, passed a law in 1870 making it mandatory for district school officials to "make all necessary arrangements for the instruction of the white and colored youth . . . in separate schools. They shall provide the same facilities for each . . . but the children of the white and colored races shall not be taught together in any sub-district of the state." Ga. Laws 1870, p. 56. As soon as they were redeemed, the other southern states enacted similar legislation providing for segregated schools and gradually the states incorporated the provision into their constitutions. See, for example, Ark. Laws 1873, p. 423; THE JOURNAL OF THE TEXAS CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION 1875, pp. 608-616; Miss. Laws 1878, p. 103; STEPHENSON, RACE DISTINCTIONS IN AMERICAN LAW 170-176 (1908). fear of federal intervention. This agreement preserved the pragmatic and material ends of Reconstruction at the expense of the enforcement of not only the Fourteenth Amendment but the Fifteenth Amendment as well.[19] For it brought in its wake peonage and disfranchisement as well as segregation and other denials of equal protection. Although there is grave danger in oversimplification of the complexities of history, on reflection it seems clear that more profoundly than constitutional amendments and wordy statutes, the Compromise of 1877 shaped the future of four million freedmen and their progeny for generations to come. For the road to freedom and equality, which had seemed sure and open in 1868, was now to be securely blocked and barred by a maze of restrictions and limitations proclaimed as essential to a way of life.

D. Consequences of the 1877 Compromise.

Once the South was left to its own devices, the militant irreconcilables quickly seized or consolidated power. Laws and practices designed to achieve rigid segregation and the disfranchisement of the Negro came on in increasing numbers and harshness.

---

[19] The explanation for this reversal of national policy in 1877 and the abandonment of an experiment that had enlisted national support and deeply aroused the emotions and hopes has been sought in many quarters. The most commonly accepted and often repeated story is that authorized spokesmen of Hayes met representatives of the Southern Democrats at the Wormley House in Washington in late February, 1877, and promised the withdrawal of troops and abandonment of the Negro in return for the support of southern Congressmen for Hayes against the Democratic candidate Samuel J. Tilden in the contested Presidential election. Recent investigation has demonstrated that the so-called "Wormley House Bargain", though offered by southern participants as the explanation, is not the full relevation of the complex and elaborate maneuvering which finally led to the agreement. See WOODWARD, REUNION AND REACTION: THE COMPROMISE OF 1877 AND THE END OF RECONSTRUCTION (1951) for an elaborate and detailed explanation of the compromise agreement.

The policy of the southern states was to destroy the political power of the Negro so that he could never seriously challenge the order that was being established. By the poll tax, the Grandfather Clause, the white primary, gerrymandering, the complicated election procedures, and by unabated intimidation and threats of violence, the Negro was stripped of effective political participation.[20]

The final blow to the political respectability of the Negro came with disfranchisement in the final decade of the Nineteenth Century and the early years of the present century when the discriminatory provisions were written into the state constitutions.[21] That problem the Court dealt with during the next forty years from Guinn v. United States, 238 U. S. 347 to Terry v. Adams, 345 U. S. 461.

A movement to repeal the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments shows the extremity to which the irreconcilables were willing to go to make certain that the Negro remained in an inferior position. At the Mississippi Constitutional Convention of 1890, a special committee studied the matter and concluded that "the white people only are capable of conducting and maintaining the government" and that the Negro race, "even if its people were educated, being wholly unequal to such responsibility," should be excluded from the franchise. It, therefore, resolved that the "true and only efficient remedy for the great and important difficulties" that would ensue from Negro participation lay

Chrisman of Mississippi could say that there had not been a full vote and a fair count in his state since 1875, that they had preserved the ascendancy of the whites by revolutionary methods. in the "repeal of the Fifteenth Amendment . . . whereby such restrictions and limitations may be put upon Negro suffrage as may be necessary and proper for the maintenance of good and stable government . . ." [22]

A delegate to the Virginia Constitutional Convention of 1901-1902 submitted a resolution calling for a repeal of the Fifteenth Amendment because it is wrong, "in that it proceeds on the theory that the two races are equally competent of free government." [23] Senator Edward Carmack of Tennessee gave notice in 1903 that he would bring in a bill to repeal the Amendments.[24] The movement, though unsuccessful, clearly illustrates the temper of the white South.

Having consigned the Negro to a permanently inferior caste status, racist spokesmen, with unabashed boldness, set forth views regarding the Negro's unassimilability and uneducability even more pernicious than those held by the old South. Ben Tillman, the leader of South Carolina, declared that a Negro should not have the same treatment as a white man, "for the simple reason that God Almighty made him colored and did not make him white." He lamented the end of slavery which reversed the process of improving the Negro and "inoculated him with the virus of Drawing on the theory of evolution as expressed by Darwin and the theory of progress developed by Spencer, persons of scholarly pretension speeded the work of justifying an inferior status for the Negro.[27] Alfred H. Stone, having the reputation of a widely respected scholar in Mississippi, declared that the "Negro was an inferior type of man with predominantly African customs and character traits whom no amount of education or improvement of environmental conditions could ever elevate to as high a scale in the human species as the white man." Characteristics of the Southern Negro declared that "the first important thing to remember in judging the Negro was that his mental capacity was inferior to that of the white man." [28]

Such was the real philosophy behind the late 19th Century segregation laws—an essential part of the whole racist complex. Controlling economic and political interests in the South were convinced that the Negro's subjugation was essential to their survival, and the Court in Plessy v. Ferguson had ruled that such subjugation through public authority was sanctioned by the Constitution. This is the overriding vice of Plessy v. Ferguson. For without the sanction of Plessy v. Ferguson, archaic and provincial notions of racial superiority could not have injured and disfigured an entire region for so long a time. The full force and effect of the protection afforded by the Fourteenth Amendment was effectively blunted by the vigorous efforts of the proponents of the concept that the Negro was inferior. This nullification was effectuated in all aspects of Negro life in the South, particularly in the field of education, by the exercise of state power.

As the invention of the cotton gin stilled the voices of Southern Abolitionists, Plessy v. Ferguson chilled the development in the South of opinion conducive to the acceptance of Negroes on the basis of equality because those of the white South desiring to afford Negroes the equalitarian status which the Civil War Amendments had hoped to achieve were barred by state law from acting in accordance with their beliefs. In this connection, it is significant that the Populist movement flourished for a

That the South was not alone in these views is clearly shown by Logan's study of the Northern press between 1877 and 1901. short period during the 1890's and threatened to take over political control of the South through a coalition of the poor Negro and poor white farmers.[29] This movement was completely smashed and since Plessy v. Ferguson no similar phenomenon has taken hold.

Without the "constitutional" sanction which Plessy v. Ferguson affords, racial segregation could not have become entrenched in the South, and individuals and local communities would have been free to maintain public school systems in conformity with the underlying purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment by providing education without racial distinctions. The doctrine of Plessy v. Ferguson was essential to the successful maintenance of a racial caste system in the United States. Efforts toward the elimination of race discrimination are jeopardized as long as the separate but equal doctrine endures. But for this doctrine we could more confidently assert that ours is a democratic society based upon a belief in individual equality.

Before the end of the century, even without repeal of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, those forces committed to a perpetuation of the slave concept of the Negro had realized their goal. They had defied the federal government, threatened the white defenders of equal rights, had used intimidation and violence against the Negro and had effectively smashed a political movement designed to unite the Negro and the poor whites. ing segregated schools were written into state constitutions and statutes. Negroes had been driven from participation in political affairs, and a veritable maze of Jim Crow laws had been erected to "keep the Negro in his place" (of inferiority), all with impunity. There was no longer any need to pretend either that Negroes were getting an education equal to the whites or were entitled to it.

In the Constitutional Convention of Virginia, 1901-1902, Senator Carter Glass, in explaining a resolution requiring that state funds be used to maintain primary schools for four months before being used for establishment of higher grades, explained that "white people of the black sections of Virginia should be permitted to tax themselves, and after a certain point had been passed which would safeguard the poorer classes of those communities, divert that fund to the exclusive use of white children. . . ." [30]

Senator Vardaman thought it was folly to make such pretenses. In Mississippi there were too many people to educate and not enough money to go around, he felt. The state, he insisted, should not spend as much on the education of Negroes as it was doing. "There is no use multiplying words about it," he said in 1899, "the negro will not be permitted to rise above the station he now fills." Money spent on his education was, therefore, a "positive unkindness" to him. "It simply renders him unfit for the work which the white man has prescribed and which he will be forced to perform." [31] Vardaman's scholarly compatriot, Dunbar Rowland, seconded these views in 1902, when he said that "thoughtful men in the South were beginning to lose faith in the power of education which had been heretofore given to uplift the negro," and to complain of the burden thus placed upon the people of the South in their poverty.[32]

The views of Tillman, Vardaman, Stone, Rowland, Glass and others were largely a justification for what had been done by the time they uttered them. The South had succeeded in setting up the machinery by which it was hoped to retain the Negro in an inferior status. Through separate, inferior schools, through an elaborate system of humiliating Jim Crow, and through effective disfranchisement of the Negro, the exclusive enjoyment of first-class citizenship had now become the sole possession of white persons.

And, finally, the Negro was effectively restored to an inferior position through laws and through practices, now dignified as "custom and tradition." Moreover, this relationship—of an inferior Negro and superior white status—established through laws, practice, custom and tradition, was even more rigidly enforced than in the ante-bellum era. As one historian has aptly stated:

> "Whether by state law or local law, or by the more pervasive coercion of sovereign white opinion, 'the Negro's place' was gradually defined—in the courts, schools, and libraries, in parks, theaters, hotels, and residential districts, in hospitals, insane

This is the historic background against which the validity of the separate but equal doctrine must be tested. History reveals it as a part of an overriding purpose to defeat the aims of the Thirteenth, Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments. Segregation was designed to insure inequality—to discriminate on account of race and color—and the separate but equal doctrine accommodated the Constitution to that purpose. Separate but equal is a legal fiction. There never was and never will be any separate equality. Our Constitution cannot be used to sustain ideologies and practices which we as a people abhor.

That the Constitution is color blind is our dedicated belief. We submit that this Court cannot sustain these school segregation laws under any separate but equal concept unless it is willing to accept as truths the racist notions of the perpetuators of segregation and to repeat the tragic error of the Plessy court supporting those who would nullify the Fourteenth Amendment and the basic tenet of our way of life which it incorporates. We respectfully suggest that it is the obligation of this Court to correct that error by holding that these laws and constitutional provisions which seek to condition educational opportunities on the basis of race and color are historic aberrations and are inconsistent with the federal Constitution and cannot stand. The separate but equal doctrine of Plessy v. Ferguson should now be overruled.

CONCLUSION TO PART ONE

In short, our answer to Question No. 3 proposed by the Court is that it is within the judicial power, whatever the evidence concerning Questions 2(a) and (b) may disclose, to hold that segregated schools violate the Fourteenth Amendment, and for the reasons hereinabove stated that such power should now be exercised.

WHEREFORE, it is respectfully submitted that constitutional provisions and statutes involved in these cases are invalid and should be struck down.

PART TWO

This portion of the brief is directed to questions one and two propounded by the Court:

> "1. What evidence is there that the Congress which submitted and the State legislatures and conventions which ratified the Fourteenth Amendment contemplated or did not contemplate, understood or did not understand, that it would abolish segregation in public schools?
>
> "2. If neither the Congress in submitting nor the States in ratifying the Fourteenth Amendment understood that compliance with it would require the immediate abolition of segregation in public schools, was it nevertheless the understanding of the framers of the Amendment
>
> "(a) that future Congresses might, in the exercise of their power under Sec. 5 of the Amendment, abolish such segregation, or
>
> "(b) that it would be within the judicial power, in light of future conditions, to construe the Amendment as abolishing such segregation of its own force?"

I.

The Fourteenth Amendment was intended to destroy all caste and color legislation in the United States, including racial segregation.

Research by political scientists and historians, specialists on the period between 1820 and 1900, and other experts in the field, as well as independent research by attorneys in these cases, convinces us that: (1) there is ample evidence that the Congress which submitted and the states which ratified the Fourteenth Amendment contemplated and understood that the Amendment would deprive the states of the power to impose any racial distinctions in determining when, where, and how its citizens would enjoy the various civil rights afforded by the states; (2) in so far as views of undeveloped public education in the 1860's can be applied to universal compulsory education in the 1950's, the right to public school education was one of the civil rights with respect to which the states were deprived of the power to impose racial distinctions; (3) while the framers of the Fourteenth Amendment clearly intended that Congress should have the power to enforce the provisions of the Amendment, they also clearly intended that the Amendment would be prohibitory on the states without Congressional action.

The historic background of the Fourteenth Amendment and the legislative history of its adoption show clearly that the framers intended that the Amendment would deprive the states of power to make any racial distinction in the enjoyment of civil rights. It is also clear that the statutes involved in these cases impose racial distinctions which the framers of the Amendment and others concerned with its adoption understood to be beyond the power of a state to enforce.

The framers of the Fourteenth Amendment were men who came to the 39th Congress with a well defined background of Abolitionist doctrine dedicated to the equalitarian principles of real and complete equality for all men. Congressional debates during this period must be read with an understanding of this background along with the actual legal and political status of the Negro at the end of the Civil War. This background gives an understanding of the determination of the framers of the Fourteenth Amendment to change the inferior legal and political status of Negroes and to give them the full protection of the Federal Government in the enjoyment of complete and real equality in all civil rights.[34]

BLEED THROUGH

A. The Era Prior to the Civil War Was Marked By Determined Efforts to Secure Recognition of the Principle of Complete and Real Equality For All Men Within the Existing Constitutional Framework of Our Government.

The men who wrote the Fourteenth Amendment were themselves products of a gigantic antislavery crusade which, in turn, was an expression of the great humanitarian reform movement of the Age of Enlightenment. This philosophy upon which the Abolitionists had taken their stand had been adequately summed up in Jefferson's basic proposition "that all men are created equal" and "are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights." To this philosophy they adhered with an almost fanatic devotion and an unswerving determination to obliterate any obstructions which stood in the way of its fulfillment. In their drive toward this goal, it may be that they thrust aside some then accepted notions of law and, indeed, that they attempted to give to the Declaration of Independence a substance which might have surprised its draftsmen. No matter, the crucial point is that their revolutionary drive was successful and that it was climaxed in the Amendment here under discussion.

The first Section of the Fourteenth Amendment is the legal capstone of the revolutionary drive of the Abolitionists to reach the goal of true equality. It was in this spirit that they wrote the Fourteenth Amendment and it is in the light of this revolutionary idealism that the questions propounded by this Court can best be answered.

In the beginning, the basic and immediate concern of the Abolitionists was necessarily slavery itself. The total question of removing all other discriminatory relationships after the abolition of slavery was at first a matter for the future. As a consequence, the philosophy of equality was in a state of continuous development from 1830 through the time of the passage of the Fourteenth Amendment. However, the ultimate objective was always clearly in mind—absolute and complete equality for all Americans.

During the pre-Civil War decades, the antislavery movement here and there began to develop special meaning and significance in the legal concept of "privileges and immunities," the concept of "due process" and the most important concept of all for these cases, "equal protection of the laws." In the immediately succeeding sections, we shall show how the development of these ideas culminated in a firm intention to obliterate all class distinction as a part of the destruction of a caste society in America.

The development of each of these conceptions was often ragged and uneven with much overlapping: what was "equal protection" to one was "due process" or "privilege and immunity" to another. However, regardless of the phrase used, the basic tenet of all was the uniform belief that Negroes were citizens and, as citizens, freedom from discrimination was their right. To them "discrimination" included all forms of racial distinctions.

Equality Under Law

One tool developed to secure full standing for Negroes was the concept of equal protection of the laws. It was one thing, and a very important one, to declare as a political abstraction that "all men are created equal," and quite another to attach concrete rights to this state of equality. The Declaration of Independence did the former. The latter was Charles Sumner's outstanding contribution to American law.

The great abstraction of the Declaration of Independence was the central rallying point for the Abolitionists. When slavery was the evil to be attacked, no more was needed. But as some of the New England states became progressively more committed to abolition, the focus of interest shifted from slavery itself to the status and rights of the free Negro. In the Massachusetts legislature in the 1840's, Henry Wilson, manufacturer, Abolitionist, and later United States Senator and Vice President, led the fight against discrimination, with "equality" as his rallying cry.[35] One Wilson measure adopted by the Massachusetts Legislature in 1845 gave the right to recover damages to any person "unlawfully excluded" from the Massachusetts public schools.[36]

Boston thereafter established a segregated school for Negro children, the legality of which was challenged in Roberts v. City of Boston, 5 Cush. (Mass.) 198 (1849). Charles Sumner, who later was to play such an important role in the Congress that formulated the Fourteenth Amendment, was counsel for Roberts. His oral argument, which the Abolitionists widely circulated, is one of the landmarks in the crystallization of the equalitarian concept.

This case was technically an action for damages under the Wilson Act. However, Sumner attacked segregation in public schools on the broader ground that segregation violated the Massachusetts Constitution which provided: "All men are created free and equal", and it was from this base that he launched his attack.

> "Of Equality I shall speak, not as a sentiment, but as a principle. . . . * * * Thus it is with all moral and political ideas. First appearing as a sentiment, they awake a noble impulse, filling the soul with generous sympathy, and encouraging to congenital effort. Slowly recognized, they finally pass into a formula, to be acted upon, to be applied, to be defended in the concerns of life, as principles." [37]

"Equality before the law" [38] was the formula he employed. He traced the equalitarian theory from the eighteenth century French philosophers through the French Revolution into the language of the French Revolutionary Constitution of 1791,[39] the Constitution of February 1793,[40] the Constitution of June 1793 [41] and the Charter of Louis Phillipe.[42] Equality before the law, i.e., equality of rights, was the real meaning of the Massachusetts constitutional provision. Before it "all . . . distinctions disappear":

> "He may be poor, weak, humble, or black—he may be Caucasian, Jewish, Indian or Ethiopian race —he may be of French, German, English or Irish extraction; but before the Constitution of Massachusetts all these distinctions disappear. He is not poor, weak, humble, or black; nor is he French, German, English or Irish; he is a MAN, the equal of all his fellowmen." [43]

Hence, he urged, separate schools are illegal.

The Massachusetts court rejected Sumner's argument and refused to grant relief. Subsequent thereto, in 1853, the Legislature of Massachusetts, after careful consideration of the problem involving hearings and reports, amended the Wilson statute by providing, among other things, that in determining the qualifications of school children in public schools in Massachusetts "no distinction was to be made on account of the race, color or religious opinions of the appellant or scholar." [44]

The Committee on Education of the House of Representatives in its report recommending adoption of this bill carefully considered the arguments for and against the measure and concluded:

"Your committee believe, in the words of another, that 'The only security we can have for a healthy and efficient system of public instruction rests in the deep interest and vigilant care with which the more intelligent watch over the welfare of the schools. This only will secure competent teachers, indefatigable exertion, and a high standard of excellence; and where the colored children are mingled up with the mass of their more favored fellows, they will partake of the advantages of this watchful oversight. Shut out and separated, they are sure to be neglected and to experience all the evils of an isolated and despised class. One of the great merits of our system of public instruction is the fusion of all classes which it produces. From a childhood which shares the same bench and sports there can hardly arise a manhood of aristocratic prejudice or separate castes and classes. Our common-school system suits our institutions, promotes the feeling of brotherhood, and the habit of republican equality. To debar the colored race from these advantages, even if we still secured to them equal educational results, is a sore injustice and wrong, and is taking the surest means of perpetuating a prejudice that should be depreciated and discountenanced by all intelligent and Christian men." [45]

Thus, the argument and theories advanced by Sumner, although rejected by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, finally became incorporated into the law of the State of Massachusetts. More important, however, is the fact that the argument of Sumner was widely distributed throughout the country during the period immediately preceding the consideration of the Fourteenth Amendment.[46] As a consequence it became a fundamental article of faith among the Radical Republicans that from a constitutional standpoint racial segregation was incompatible with constitutional guarantees of equal protection.[47]

The analysis of the available materials covering the period from 1830 to 1860, while important to this point, is too voluminous to be included in the argument at this point. We have, therefore, placed this analysis in a supplement at the end of the brief. The analysis of these materials compels the following historical conclusions:

1. To the Abolitionists, equality was an absolute—not a relative—concept which comprehended that no legal recognition be given to racial distinctions of any kind. The notion that any state could require racial segregation was totally incompatible with this doctrine.

2. The phrases—"privileges and immunities," "equal protection," and "due process"—that were to appear in the Amendment had come to have a specific significance to opponents of slavery in the United States. Proponents of slavery knew and understood what that significance was, even as they disagreed with these theories. Members of the Congress that proposed the Amendment, shared this knowledge.

3. These radical Abolitionists, who had been in the minority prior to the Civil War, gained control of the Republican party in Congress during the course of the war and thus emerged in a dominant position in the Congress which was to write the Fourteenth Amendment. Ten of the members of the Joint Committee of Fifteen were men who had definite antislavery backgrounds and two others had likewise opposed slavery.

[47] See, for example, Sumner resolution offered Congress on December 4, 1865 which called for "The organization of an educational system for the equal benefit of all without distinction of color or race." Cong. Globe, 39th Cong., 1st Sess. 2 (1865-1866).

BLEED THROUGH

4. When the Joint Committee of Fifteen translated into constitutional provisions the equalitarian concepts held and widely bruited about in the struggle against slavery, it used the traditional phrases that had all become freighted with equalitarian meaning in its widest sense: "equal protection", "privileges and immunities" and "due process."

In these respects history buttresses and gives particular content to the recent admonition of this Court that "[w]hatever else the framers sought to achieve, it is clear that the matter of primary concern was the establishment of equality in the enjoyment of basic civil and political rights and the preservation of those rights from discriminatory action on the part of the States based on considerations of race and color." Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U. S. 1, 23.

Despite the high principles and dedication of the leaders of the Abolitionist movement, their program ran into repeated roadblocks from both individual groups and state machinery. The movement was not only blocked in so far as the abolition of slavery itself was concerned, but was met by an ever increasing tendency on the part of all the southern states and some northern states to gradually cut down on the rights of free Negroes and to bring their status nearer and nearer to that of slaves. This countermovement culminated in the decision of the Supreme Court in the Dred Scott case (Scott v. Sandford, 19 How. 393) that no person of the "African race, whether free or not" could enjoy, under the Constitution of the United States, any right or protection whatsoever. All Negroes were thereby left, by the principles of that case, to the absolute, unrestrained power of the several states.

B. The Movement For Complete Equality Reached Its Successful Culmination in the Civil War and the Fourteenth Amendment.

The onset of the Civil War marked the turning point of the Abolitionists' drive to achieve absolute equality for all Americans. The first great success came on January 1, 1863, when President Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation freed all slaves in those areas in insurrection against the United States. Obviously this was far from a complete victory. The doctrines enunciated by Chief Justice Taney in the Dred Scott case were still unqualified and remained as a part of the "constitutional law" of the time.

In February, 1865, the Abolitionist-dominated 38th Congress adopted and submitted to the states what was to become the Thirteenth Amendment to the Constitution. However, the Radical Republicans in Congress were intensely aware that the abolition of slavery constituted only a partial attainment of their goal of complete political and legal equality for Negroes. They had already determined as early as the spring and summer of 1862 to strike at the objective of federal statutory and constitutional guarantees for Negro equality. As yet, however, their thinking had not succeeded in distilling clearly a series of specifically defined legal and political objectives which they proposed to write into federal law and Constitution.

It should be observed in passing that their reason for this obviously was not necessarily pure Abolitionist idealism. They were in part motivated by hard practical considerations of Republican Party ascendency, and the fear that a restored South, in which Negroes were not given complete legal and political equality, would fall into the hands of a pre-war conservative white political leadership which would threaten the national political control of the Radical Republicans themselves. Thus their idealistic, social philosophy and their hard practical considerations of party interest dovetailed very nicely.[48]

It was to require the events of 1865-66, most notably the attempt to restore political rule in the South and the attempt to impose an inferior non-citizenship status upon the Negro in the restored southern states, to make clear to the Radical Republicans their new constitutional objectives and the means they would seek to obtain it.

C. The Principle of Absolute and Complete Equality Began to Be Translated Into Federal Law as Early as 1862.

In 1862 Congress addressed itself to an immediate problem over which it had authority. In debating the bill which was to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, Representative Bingham said: "The great privilege and immunity of an American citizen to be respected everywhere in this land, and especially in this District, is that they shall not be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law".[49] Representative Fessenden concluded: "If I do not mistake, it is quite apparent that when this bill shall be put on its final passage it will proclaim liberty to the slaves within this District. These men—for God created them men, though man has used them as goods and chattels—slaves—these men and women and children will, when the President of the United States signs this bill, be translated... [to a] condition in which they are invested with the rights of freemen, upon which none can trespass with impunity; since over the person of the free black as well as the free white man there is thrown the broad shield of the nation's majesty."[50] The bill was enacted into law.[51]

Simultaneously Congress discontinued the application of the Black Codes of Maryland and Virginia to the District of Columbia.[52]

Between the time of the Emancipation Proclamation in 1863 and the formulation of the Fourteenth Amendment, Congress took several forward steps to secure complete equality for the class so recently freed. These steps came in the form of particular solutions to particular problems.

[52] 12 Stat. 407 (1862).

To this Congress (38th), the most immediate problem was one which fell under their glance daily, the problem of transportation in the District of Columbia. Congressional treatment of this problem is of significance because it reveals the early determination of the Radical Republicans to prohibit racial segregation.

In 1863, Congress amended the charter of the Alexandria and Washington Railroad to eliminate the practice of putting white and Negro passengers in separate parts of the street cars.[53] When, in 1864, the Washington and Georgetown street car company attempted to put colored passengers in cars separate from those of the white passengers, Senator Sumner denounced the practice in the Senate and set forth on his crusade to prohibit all racial distinctions by first eliminating street car segregation in the District.[54] In 1865, he carried to passage a law applicable to all District carriers that "no person shall be excluded from any car on account of color."[55]

The debate on the street car bill covered the entire issue of segregation in transportation. Those who supported prohibition of segregation did so on the ground that any such separation was a denial of equality itself. Senator Wilson denounced the "Jim Crow car," declaring it to be "in defiance of decency."[56] Senator Sumner persuaded his brethen to accept the Massachusetts view, saying that in Massachusetts, "the rights of every colored person are placed on an equality with those of white persons. They have the same right with white persons to ride in every public conveyance in the Commonwealth."[57] Thus, when Congress in 1866 framed the Fourteenth Amendment, it did so against a background of Congressional determination that segregation in transportation was unequal, unjust, and was "in defiance of decency."

D. From the Beginning the Thirty-Ninth Congress Was Determined to Eliminate Race Distinctions From American Law.

The 39th Congress which was to propose the Fourteenth Amendment convened in December 1865 with the realization that, although slavery had been abolished, the overall objective, the complete legal and political equality for all men had not been realized. This was dramatically emphasized by the infamous Black Codes being enacted throughout the southern states. These Black Codes had the single purpose of providing additional legislative sanction to maintain the inferior status for all Negroes which had been judicially decreed in the opinion in the case of Scott v. Sandford, 19 How. 393.

The Black Codes, while they grudgingly admitted that Negroes were no longer slaves, nonetheless used the states' power to impose and maintain essentially the same inferior, servile position which Negroes had occupied prior to the abolition of slavery. These codes thus followed the legal pattern of the ante-bellum slave codes. Like their slavery forerunners, these codes compelled Negroes to work for arbitrarily limited pay; restricted their mobility; forbade them, among other things, to carry firearms; forbade their testimony in a court against any white man; and highly significant here, contained innumerable provisions for segregation on carriers and in public places. In at least three states these codes prohibited Negroes from attending the public schools provided for white children.[58]

[58] See the summary in Senator Wilson's speech before Congress, Cong. Globe, 39th Cong., 1st Sess. 39-40, 589 (1866); 1 FLEMING, DOCUMENTARY HISTORY OF RECONSTRUCTION 273-312 (1906); MCPHERSON, THE POLITICAL HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES DURING THE PERIOD OF RECONSTRUCTION 29-44 (1880).

It was this inferior caste position which the Radical Republicans in Congress were determined to destroy. They were equally determined that by federal statutory or constitutional means, or both, Congress would not only invalidate the existing Black Codes but would proscribe any and all future attempts to enforce governmentally-imposed caste distinctions.

Congress was well aware of the fact that to take this step involved a veritable revolution in federal-state relations. A number of Senators and Representatives in the 39th Congress, by speech and resolution, made it eminently clear that they aimed at nothing less than the total destruction of all hierarchy, oligarchy and class rule in the southern states. One of the more notable resolutions of this kind was that of Senator Charles Sumner, introduced on December 4, 1865, at the opening of the session. This resolution asserted that no state formerly declared to be in rebellion was to be allowed to resume its relation to the Union until "the complete reestablishment of loyalty . . ." and:

> "The complete suppression of all oligarchical pretensions, and the complete enfranchisement of all citizens, so that there shall be no denial of rights on account of color or race; but justice shall be impartial, and all shall be equal before the law."

Another requirement of Sumner's resolution called for:

> "The organization of an educational system for the equal benefit of all without distinction of color or race."[59]

Sumner thus recognized the close relationship between the destruction of the southern ruling class and the elimination of segregation in the educational system.

Representative Jehu Baker of Illinois introduced a similar resolution in the House of Representatives, which read in part as follows:

---

[59] Cong. Globe, 39th Cong., 1st Sess. 2 (1865-1866).

BLEED THROUGH

"Whereas class rule and aristocratic principles of government have burdened well nigh all Europe with enormous public debts and standing armies, which press as a grievous incubus on the people, absorbing their substance, impeding their culture, and impairing their happiness; and whereas the class rule and aristocratic element of slaveholding which found a place in our Republic has proved itself, in like manne, hurtful to our people . . . Therefore,

"Resolved, (as the sense of this House,) That once for all we should have done with class rule and aristocracy as a privileged power before the law in this nation, no matter where or in what form they may appear; and that, in restoring the normal relations of the States lately in rebellion, it is the high and sacred duty of the Representatives of the people to proceed upon the true, as distinguished from the false, democratic principle, and to realize and secure the largest attainable liberty to the whole people of the Republic, irrespective of class or race."[60]

There were numerous other resolutions and speeches expressing similar sentiments. All of the resolutions were referred to the Joint Committee on Reconstruction and are a part of the background of that committee's work in the framing of the Fourteenth Amendment.

These expressions of principle were started toward statutory fruition by Senator Trumbull's Bill to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau. The debates which followed the introduction of his Senate Bill No. 60 are of particular interest because they make it clear that a large number of the Radical Republicans regarded the destruction of segregation in the school districts of the southern states as a highly desirable legislative objective. What followed amounted to a forthright assault on the idea that there could be racial segregation in the public schools.

Representative Hubbard of Connecticut expressed the broad pattern of thinking of which this bill was a part:

> "The words, caste, race, color, ever unknown to the Constitution, . . . are still potent for evil on the lips of men whose minds are swayed by prejudice or blinded by passion, and the freedmen need the protection of this bill.
>
> "The era is dawning when it will be a reproach to talk in scorn about the distinctions of race or color. Our country is, and must be, cosmopolitan. . . .
>
> "It is in vain that we talk about race, caste, or color. . . ." [61]

Likewise, Representative Rousseau of Kentucky stated:

> ". . . Here are four school-houses taken possession of, and unless they mix up white children with black, the white children can have no chance in these schools for instruction. And so it is wherever this Freedmen's Bureau operates." [62]

Representative Dawson of Pennsylvania recognized that the supporters of the bill:

> ". . . hold that the white and black race are equal. . . . Their children are to attend the same schools with white children, and to sit side by side with them. . . ." [63]

Of more importance was S.61 "A Bill to Protect All Persons in the United States in Their Civil Rights and Furnish the Means of Vindication." This bill, though introduced through Senator Trumbull in his capacity as Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, was in fact a measure sponsored by the entire Radical Republican majority.

The bill forbade any "discrimination in civil rights or immunities" among "the people of the United States on account of race, color, or previous condition of slavery". It provided that all persons should have "full and equal benefits of all laws" for the security of their persons and their property.

In a lengthy speech, Senator Trumbull defended the wisdom and constitutionality of this bill in detail. The Thirteenth Amendment, he argued, made the bill both constitutional and necessary.

> "Then, sir, I take it that any statute which is not equal to all, and which deprives any citizen of civil rights which are secured to other citizens, is an unjust encroachment upon his liberty; and is, in fact, a badge of servitude which, by the Constitution, is prohibited."[64]

Senator Trumbull's argument precipitated a lengthy debate on the constitutional issues. Opponents of the measure, conceding that Congress had the power under the Thirteenth Amendment to assure freedom of Negroes, denied that Congress had the power to endow Negroes with citizenship and civil rights. To sustain their position they pointed to the fact that Negroes who were freed prior to the Emancipation Proclamation were not treated as citizens and under the authority of the Dred Scott case could not be citizens.[65]

In reply, Trumbull advanced the additional constitutional argument that, once slavery was abolished, the naturalization clause of the Constitution provided Congress with the power to endow Negroes with the citizenship the Dred Scott case had held they could not otherwise enjoy. Trumbull thus adopted the position of Chief Justice Taney in the Dred Scott case that the power to confer citizenship was vested in the federal, not the state government.

Another major area of controversy with respect to the bill was as to its scope. Time and again the Democrats and the more conservative Republicans in the Senate asserted that the bill would invalidate every state law which provided for racial segregation, or provided a different rule for persons of different races.[66] For example, there was the charge of Senator Cowan, a Republican of Pennsylvania, who said:

> "Now, as I understand the meaning . . . of this bill, it is that there shall be no discrimination made between the inhabitants of the several States of this Union, none in any way. In Pennsylvania, for the greater convenience of the people, and for the greater convenience, I may say, of both classes of the people, in certain districts the Legislature has provided schools for colored children, has discriminated as between the two classes of children. We put the African children in this school-house and the white children over in that school-house, and educate them there as we best can. Is this amendment to the Constitution of the United States abolishing slavery to break up that system which Pennsylvania has adopted for the education of her white and colored children? Are the school directors who carry out that law and who make this distinction between these classes of children to be punished for a violation of this statute of the United States? To me it is monstrous."[67]

Senator Howard in reply gave the Conservatives no comfort:

> "I do not understand the bill which is now before us to contemplate anything else but this, that in respect to all civil rights . . . there is to be hereafter > no distinction between the white race and the black race. It is to secure to these men whom we have made free the ordinary rights of a freeman and nothing else. . . . There is no invasion of the legitimate rights of the States." [68]

But, perhaps the best answer of all to these assertions of the sweeping character of the bill was given by Senator Morrill of Vermont, a member of the Joint Committee of Fifteen:

> "The Senator from Kentucky tells us that the proposition [federal guarantee of civil rights] is revolutionary, . . . I admit that this species of legislation is absolutely revoluntionary. But are we not in the midst of revolution? Is the Senator from Kentucky utterly oblivious to the grant results of four years of war?" [69]

It is highly significant that Senator Morrill was not only a member of the Joint Committee of Fifteen, even then engaged in drafting the Fourteenth Amendment, but that he later was to insist that the Fourteenth Amendment prohibited separate but equal provisions in state school legislation.

After two full days of debate, the Senate passed the Trumbull bill by a vote of 33 to 12.

The only rational inference to be drawn from the legislative history of the Trumbull bill in the Senate is that the great majority of that body was determined to bar the states from using their power to impose or maintain racial distinctions. The same majority was of the opinion that the federal government had constitutional authority so to delimit such action by the state.

In the House, the Conservatives pointed out forcefully that the text of the bill presented would destroy all limitations on federal power over state legislation and would likewise destroy all state legislative and judicial provisions making distinctions against Negroes. Representative Rogers observed:

[68] Id. at 504.

[69] Id. at 570.

> "In the State of Pennsylvania there is a discrimination made between the schools for white children and the schools for black. The laws there provide that certain schools shall be set apart for black persons, and certain schools shall be set apart for white persons. Now, if this Congress has a right, by such a bill as this, to enter the soveriegn domain of a State . . . then, by parity of reasoning, it has a right to enter the domain of that State and inflict upon the people there, without their consent, the right of the negro to enjoy the elective franchise. . . ."[70]

In a somewhat disingenous attempt to deal with the argument of the Conservatives, Representative Wilson of Iowa, chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, argued vaguely that the bill would not have the effect of destroying all legislation discriminating on the basis of race.[71] Nevertheless Wilson broadly defined the term civil rights as used in the bill as being "the natural rights of man." Moreover, he observed that "immunities" secured "to citizens of the United States equality in the exemptions of the law."[72]

At this point, Representative Bingham of Ohio, who had become converted to the Conservatives' constitutional power argument, made a notable address to the House. While admitting that perhaps Congress was at that time without constitutional authority to enact so sweeping a bill, he said it was nevertheless true that the bill as it stood was as sweeping as was charged by the Conservatives.

Representative Bingham then made it preeminently clear that he entirely approved of the sweeping objectives of the bill as it came from the Senate. His willingness to accept any modification of the bill was solely on the grounds of an overwhelming present constitutional objection which he himself was even then in the process of curing with a proposal for a constitutional amendment. He said:

> "If civil rights has this extent, what, then, is proposed by the provision of the first section? Simply to strike down by congressional enactment every State constitution which makes a discrimination on account of race or color in any of the civil rights of the citizen. I might say here, without the least fear of contradiction, that there is scarcely a State in this Union which does not, by its Constitution or by its statute laws, make some discrimination on account of race or color between citizens of the United States in respect of civil rights."[73]

Bingham then insisted that he believed that all discriminatory legislation should be wiped out by amending the Constitution.

> "The law in every State should be just; it should be no respecter of persons. It is otherwise now, and it has been otherwise for many years in many of the States of the Union. I should remedy that not by an arbitrary assumption of power, but by amending the Constitution of the United States, expressly prohibiting the States from any such abuse of power in the future."[74]

Bingham's prestige as a leader of the Radical Republican majority obliged Wilson to accept the Ohioan's interpretation. Consequently, the bill was returned to the Judiciary Committee and amended to eliminate the sweeping phrase "there shall be no discrimination in civil rights and immunities." Wilson no doubt comforted himself with the fact that even as amended the language of the bill was still revolutionary. At any rate, the Conservatives were still convinced that the bill invalidated state racial segregation laws. With considerable force, they argued that the phrase "the inhabitants of every state" . . . shall have the rights to full and equal benefits of all laws and proceedings for the "security of persons and property . . ." was properly to be broadly interpreted. In fact, Senator Davis of Kentucky had this to say:

[73] Id. at 1291.

[74] Id. at 1294.

> ". . . [T]his measure proscribes all discriminations against negroes in favor of white persons that may be made anywhere in the United States by any 'ordinance, regulation, or custom,' as well as by 'law or statute.' . . .
>
> But there are civil rights, immunities, and privileges 'which ordinances, regulations, and customs' confer upon white persons everywhere in the United States, and withhold from negroes. On ships and steamboats the most comfortable and handsomely furnished cabins and state-rooms, the first tables, and other privileges; in public hotels the most luxuriously appointed parlors, chambers, and saloons, the most sumptuous tables, and baths; in churches not only the most softly cushioned pews, but the most eligible sections of the edifices; on railroads, national, local, and street, not only seats, but whole cars, are assigned to white persons to the exclusion of negroes and mulattoes. All these discriminations in the entire society of the United States are established by ordinances, regulations, and customs. This bill proposes to break down and sweep them all away and to consummate their destruction, and bring the two races upon the same great plane of perfect equality, declares all persons who enforce those distinctions to be criminals against the United States, and subjects them to punishment by fine and imprisonment. . . ." [75]

Significantly, there was no attempt to reply to this interpretation of the amended bill.

The bill in its amended form was adopted by Congress and vetoed by President Johnson.

Representative Lawrence, who spoke in favor of overriding President Johnson's veto said:

> "This section does not limit the enjoyment of privileges to such as may be accorded only to citizens of 'some class,' or 'some race,' or 'of the least favored class,' or 'of the most favored class,' or of a particular complexion, for these distinctions were never contemplated or recognized as possible in fundamental civil rights, which are alike necessary and important to all citizens, and to make inequalities in which is rank injustice."[76]

He also said:

> ". . . distinctions created by nature of sex, age, insanity, etc., are recognized as modifying conditions and privileges, but mere race or color, as among citizens never can [be]."[77]

Numerous newspapers also thought the bill destroyed all segregation in schools, theatres, churches, public vehicles and the like.[78] Flack said of the bill:

> "Many [Congressmen] believed that the negro would be entitled to sit on juries, to attend the same schools, etc., since, if the States undertook to legislate on those matters, it might be claimed that he was denied the equal rights and privileges accorded to white men. It does not appear that all of these contentions were specifically contradicted.

There were a number of suits against local segregation laws banning Negroes from theatres, omnibuses, etc., McPherson's Scrap Book, The Civil Rights Bill, pp. 110 ff. None of these suits appear to have involved school segregation laws.

It would seem reasonable to suppose that if the bill should prove to be constitutional that these rights could not be legally denied them." [79]

* * *

". . . many of the leading papers of the country, including some of the principal Republican papers, regarded the Civil Rights Bill as a limitation of the powers of the States, and as a step towards centralization, in that it interfered with the regulation of local affairs which had hitherto been regulated by state and local authorities or by custom. This opinion was held in the North as well as in the South. There also seems to have been a general impression among the press that negroes would, by the provisions of the bill, be admitted, on the same terms and conditions as the white people, to schools, theaters, hotels, churches, railway cars, steamboats, etc." [80]

* * *

"What the papers gave as their opinion must necessarily have been the opinion of large numbers of people. There is much evidence to substantiate this conclusion, for almost immediately after the passage of the bill over the President's veto, efforts were made by the negroes to secure these rights." [81]

The following generalizations are pertinent to the relationship of the Civil Rights Act (S. 61 as amended) to the problem of segregation in schools and the Fourteenth Amendment:

1. As originally drafted, the Act contained a phrase "there shall be no discrimination in civil rights and immunities among the inhabitants of any state . . ." This was so broad in scope that most Senators and Representatives believed that it would have the effect of destroying entirely all state legistion which distinguished or classified in any manner on the basis of race. School segregation laws, statutes establishing unequal penalties in criminal codes, laws banning Negroes from juries, all alike would have become invalid as against the federal statute.

2. A great majority of the Republicans—the men who formulated the Fourteenth Amendment—had no objection to a bill which went this far. Men like Rogers, Kerr and Cowan objected to the bill on the ground that it would end all caste legislation, including segregated schools, and this was the view of the Senate. None of the bill's supporters in the House, except Wilson, denied that the bill had that effect.

3. The Bingham amendment was finally adopted in the House which struck out the "no discrimination" clause, simply because a majority of the members of the House believed that so sweeping a measure could not be justified under the Constitution as it stood. They accepted Bingham's argument that the proper remedy for removing racial distinctions and classifications in the states was a new amendment to the Constitution.

4. The logic of the Bingham constitutional objections aside, the persuasiveness of his technical objection to the Trumbull bill was immeasurably enhanced by the fact that several days before his motion to amend the Civil Rights Bill, Bingham had in fact proposed to the House, on behalf of the Joint Committee, a constitutional amendment by the terms of which his constitutional objections to the Trumbull bill were obviated. That measure, H. R. 63, with some significant changes intended to underscore the prohibition on state governmental action with the addition of the citizenship clause became the Fourteenth Amendment.[82]

5. The law as finally enacted enumerated certain rights which Trumbull and other Radicals had felt were inseparably connected with the status of freedom. However, there is no evidence that even after the modification of the bill, the enumeration in the bill was considered to exclude rights not mentioned. Kerr, Rogers, Cowan, Grimes and other conservatives still insisted that the bill, even in its final form, banned segregation laws. The phrase "the inhabitants of every race . . . shall have the right . . . to full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of persons and property" still stood in the bill and was susceptible of broad interpretation.

6. Finally, it may be observed that a majority of both Houses of Congress were ready to go beyond the provisions of the Civil Rights Act. Congressmen as diverse in their views as John A. Bingham and Henry J. Raymond, a moderate Republican and editor of the New York Times, united in proposing a constitutional amendment which would remove doubts as to the ability of Congress to destroy all state legislation discriminating and segregating on the basis of race. The forthcoming amendment, at all odds, was to set at rest all doubts as to the power of Congress to abolish all state laws making any racial distinctions or classifications.

BLEED THROUGH

The Framers of the Fourteenth Amendment

While Congress was engaged in the passage of the Civil Rights Act, a powerful congressional committee was even then wrestling with the problem of drafting a constitutional amendment which they hoped would definitely destroy all class and caste legislation in the United States. This committee was the now famous Joint Committee of Fifteen, which the two houses of Congress had established by Joint Resolution in December, 1865, to "inquire into the conditions of the states which formed the so-called Confederate States of America and report whether any or all of them were entitled to representation in Congress." It is extremely important for the purpose of this brief to observe that the Joint Committee of Fifteen was altogether under the domination of a group of Radical Republicans who were products of the great Abolitionist tradition, the equalitarianism which has been set forth earlier in this brief.

Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment, and particularly the equal protection clause, is pecularily the product of this group, plus Senators Sumner, Wilson and Trumbull.[83]

Co-chairmen of the Commitee were Representative Thaddeus Stevens of Pennsylvania and Senator William P. Fessenden of Maine.

Stevens was virtually dictator of the House. It was his dedicated belief that the Negro must be immediately elevated to a position of unconditional, legal, economic, political and social equality; and to this end he was determined to destroy every legal and political barrier that stood in the way of his goal.[84] Obviously, any constitutional amendment affecting the Negro would very heavily reflect his point of view.

Stevens believed that the law could not permit any distinctions between men because of their race. It was his understanding of the first section of the Fourteenth Amendment that: "... where any State makes a distinction in the same law between different classes of individuals, Congress shall have power to correct such discrimination and inequality ..." [85] He believed that it was up to Congress to repudiate "... the whole doctrine of the legal superiority of families or races," [85a] and that under the Amendment, "... no distinction would be tolerated in this purified Republic but what arose from merit and conduct." [86]

Senator Fessenden undoubtedly held moderate views on the Reconstruction and, these views probably accounted for his selection as Co-chairman of the Joint Committee. Although Fessenden hoped that the Republican Party would work successfully with President Johnson, he broke with Johnson on the Civil Rights Act, which he supported with conviction. He was a staunch champion of the Fourteenth Amendment. Fessenden believed that all distinctions in civil rights based upon race must be swept away, and he was in favor of excluding the southern states from any representation in Congress until this end was assured.[87]

His son reports that the essence of his views was "all civil and political distinctions on account of race or color [would] be inoperative and void. . . ." [88]

Senator James W. Grimes, Republican of Iowa, was a Moderate and a close friend of Fessenden.[89] While he was governor of Iowa, prior to his election to the Senate the state constitution was revised to provide schools free and open to all children.[90] He insisted upon free schools open to all,[91] and Lewellen, who analyzed Grimes' political ideas, concluded that—

> "Special legislation, whether for individual or class, was opposed by Grimes as contrary 'to the true theory of a Republican government' and as the 'source of great corruption.' Although he sympathized with the newly freed Negroes after the Civil War, he opposed any attempt to make them wards of the Federal government. They had been made citizens and had been given the right to vote; there was no reason in the world why a law should be passed 'applicable to colored people' and not to white people. While his ideas on the Negro question were colored by his radical opinions on the slavery question his opposition to race legislation would probably have been practically as firm upon any other subject." of Charles Sumner,[93] and "acted with the radicals in all matters pertaining to reconstruction."[94] His explicit views on segregation are unascertained.[95] He was, however, so closely allied to the insiders on the Committee who considered race and color an indefensible basis for making legal distinctions,[96] that it is safe to conclude that he espoused, or at least acquiesced in, this viewpoint.

Senator George H. Williams, an Oregon Republican and former Douglas Democrat, claimed authorship of the First Reconstruction Act of 1867, originally called the Military Reconstruction Bill, which he introduced in the Senate on February 4, 1867.[97] In commenting upon this bill he said:

> "I will say that in preparing this bill, I had no desire to oppress or injure the people of the South, but my sole purpose was to provide a system by which all classes would be protected in life, liberty, and property . . ."[98]

His views on segregation are also unascertained.[99] It should be noted, however, that there is no record of his ever lending his voice or his votes to any law providing segregation based upon race or color.

equality for Negroes.[100] He was clear and definite in his interpretation of the Civil Rights Act of 1866 and the Fourteenth Amendment. He said after the passage of the former that "in respect of all civil rights, there is to be hereafter no distinction between the white race and the black race."[101] In explaining the intention of the Joint Committee during discussion of the joint resolution to propose what was to become the Fourteenth Amendment, he said:

> "He desired to put this question of citizenship and the rights of citizens and freedmen under the civil rights bill beyond the legislative power of such gentlemen as [Senator Doolittle of Wisconsin] who would pull the whole system up by the roots and destroy it, and expose the freedmen again to the oppressions of their old masters."[102]

In another speech, while acting for Senator Fessenden as floor leader for the Amendment, Howard interpreted Section 1 as follows:

> "The last two clauses of first section . . . disable a state from depriving . . . any person . . . of life, liberty or property without due process of law, or from denying to him the equal protection of the laws of the state. This abolishes all class legislation and does away with the injustice of subjecting one caste of persons to a code not applicable to another . . . Ought not the time to be now passed when one measure of justice is to be meted out to a member of one caste while another and a different measure is meted out to the member of another caste, both castes being alike citizens of the United States . . .[103]

use whatever of color as a basis for legal distinctions.[104]

Senator Reverdy Johnson, Democrat of Maryland, was attorney for the defense in Dred Scott v. Sandford.[105] George I. Curtis, one of Scott's attorneys, credited Johnson with being the major influence in shaping the decision.[106] Where segregation was concerned, Johnson was not entirely consistent or predictable.

In 1864 he supported the motion of Senator Charles Sumner that the Washington Railroad end the exclusion of persons of color.[107] During the debate upon Sumner's motion, Johnson said:

> "It may be convenient, because it meets with the public wish or with the public taste of both classes, the white and the black, that there should be cars in which the white men and ladies are to travel, designated for that purpose, and cars in which the black men and black women are to travel, designated for that purpose. But that is a matter to be decided as between these two classes. There is no more right to exclude a black man from a car designated for the transportation of white persons than there is a right to refuse to transport in a car designated for black persons white men; and I do not suppose that anybody will contend . . . that there exists any power in the company to exclude white men from a car because the company have appropriated that car for the general transportation of black passengers.[108]

Two years later, Johnson said:

> ". . . as slavery has been abolished in the several States, those who were before slaves are now citizens of the United States, standing . . . upon the same condi-

Thus it appears that he understood that the granting of citizenship rights to Negroes meant that racial distinctions could no longer be imposed by law.

Representative John A. Bingham of Ohio, a member of the committee who has been described as the "Madison of the first section of the Fourteenth Amendment" [110] and undoubtedly its author, was a strong and fervent Abolitionist, classified with those whose views of equal protection "precluded any use whatsoever of color as a basis of legal distinctions." [111]

While the Fourteenth Amendment was pending, Representative Bingham took the view that state constitutions which barred segregated schools were "in accordance with the spirit and letter of the Constitution of the United States . . . [if] the utterance of Jefferson ever meant anything . . . it meant precisely that when he declared for equal and exact justice. . . ." [112] ever, no less extreme in his demands for Negro civil rights and Negro suffrage than men like Stevens and Sumner. Indicative of his views is his vote on May 22, 1874 against the Sargent amendment to the Civil Rights Act of 1875, which would have permitted separate but equal schools.[113] During Reconstruction Alabama was "flooded with the radical speeches of Morton and Boutwell in favor of mixed schools." [114] He was among those whose interpretation of "equal protection" would not admit color as a basis for legal distinctions.[115]

Representative Roscoe Conkling, a New York Republican, was thought to have taken his views on Reconstruction from Stevens.[116] He was called by some a protege of Stevens; at any rate, they worked as partners on much reconstruction legislation.[117] In 1868, when the readmission of Arkansas was being discussed, he voted against the Henderson Amendment to the bill which would have permitted the state to establish segregated schools.[118] In 1872 he favored the supplementary civil rights bill and voted against the Thurman amendment which would have struck out a clause permitting colored persons to enter "any place of public amusement or entertainment." [119] He was in the Senate majority which on May 22, 1874, voted down the Sargent amendment to the Civil Rights Bill, an amendment which would have permitted separate but equal schools.[120] Conkling must be classified as one of those who agreed to no legal classifications or distinctions based upon color.[121]

Representative Henry T. Blow, a Missouri Republican, first supported the views of Thaddeus Stevens in the Joint Committee and then in the second session gave his support to Bingham.[122] In either case, he acted with those who favored a broad and sweeping denial of the right of the states to make legal classifications on the basis of race or color. Blow came to Congress with a strong antislavery background and took the position that color discrimination could not be defended, as a matter of course.[123]

Representative Justin S. Morrill of Vermont is characterized as "an extreme radical", one "regularly on the side of radicalism". It is said of him that "the only part taken by him in Reconstruction was to attend the meetings of the Committee and cast his vote."[124] However, he was among those voting against the "white" clause in the Nebraska constitution when the bill to admit that state to the union was under consideration.[125] He voted against the Henderson amendment to permit segregated schools in the bill to readmit Arkansas.[126] He voted against the Sargent Amendment to allow separate but equal schools, during the debates on the bill that became the Civil Rights Act of 1875.[127] Morrill thus belongs in the group of those who did not consider color a reasonable ground for legal distinctions.[128]

Rights Act and the Fourteenth Amendment and his remarks make it clear that he favored a revolution in the southern social order.[129]

The two Democratic members of the Joint Committee from the House were both enemies of the Civil Rights Act and the Fourteenth Amendment. Representative Henry Grider of Kentucky was without influence in the drafting of the Fourteenth Amendment by the Joint Committee.[130] However, remarks of Representative Andrew Jackson Rogers of New Jersey, in opposition to these measures, are significant indication of contemporary understanding of their reach and thrust. Thus, in speaking of the Civil Rights Bill, Rogers said:

> "In the State of Pennsylvania there is a discrimination made between the schools for white children and the schools for black. The laws there provide that certain schools shall be set apart for black persons, and certain schools shall be set apart for white persons. Now, if this Congress has a right, by such a bill as this, to enter the sovereign domain of a State and interfere with these statutes . . . , then . . . it has a right to . . .., inflict upon the people . . . the right of the negro to [vote]. . . ." [131]

Similarly, in speaking of the proposed Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment on February 26, 1866, he said:

> ". . . Under this amendment, Congress would have power to compel the State to provide for white children and black children to attend the same school, upon the principle that all the people . . . shall have

E. The Fourteenth Amendment Was Intended to Write into the Organic Law of the United States the Principle of Absolute and Complete Equality in Broad Constitutional Language.

While the Civil Rights Act of 1866 was moving through the two Houses of Congress, the Joint Committee of Fifteen was engaged in the task of drafting a constitutional amendment as a part of a program for the "readmission" of the southern states to the Union. When the Committee began its meetings in January 1866, several of its members introduced proposals for constitutional amendments guaranteeing civil rights to the freedmen. After a series of drafting experiments, Representative Bingham on February 3 proposed the following:

> "The Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to secure to the citizens of each State all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States (Art. 4, Sec. 2); and to all persons in the several States equal protection in the rights of life, liberty and property (5th Amendment)." [134]

[134] This proposal with some changes was destined to become eventually the second portion of Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment. KENDRICK, op. cit. supra n. 82, at 61.

The Joint Committee found this proposal satisfactory and accordingly on February 13th introduced it in the House as H. R. 63.[135]

By now the dedicated purpose of the Radical Republicans based in part upon the ante-war equalitarian principles as opposed to caste and class legislation had to be crystallized in a Fourteenth Amendment. Necessarily, the drafters of this amendment and those who participated in the debates on the amendment recognized that constitutional amendments are properly worded in the broadest and most comprehensive language possible.

It must be borne in mind that Representative Bingham, and those who supported his position on the amendment to the Civil Rights Bill of 1866, had already demonstrated that the constitutional amendment under consideration would be at least as comprehensive in its scope and effect as the original sweeping language of the Trumbull Civil Rights Bill before it was amended in the House, and that it would be far broader than the scope of the bill as finally enacted into law. On this point, Bingham repeatedly made his intentions clear, both in his discussion on the power limitations on the Civil Rights Bill itself and in his defense of his early drafts of the proposed constitutional amendment.

Representative Rogers immediately attacked the proposed constitutional amendment (H. R. 63) as "more dangerous to the liberties of the people and the foundations of the government" than any proposal for amending the Constitution heretofore advanced. This amendment, he said, would destroy all state legislation distinguishing Negroes on the basis of race. Laws against racial intermarriage, laws applying special punishments to Negroes for certain crimes, and laws imposing segregation, including school segregation laws, alike would become unconstitutional. He said:

"Who gave the Senate the constitutional power to pass that bill guarantying equal rights to all, if it is necessary to amend the organic law in the manner proposed by this joint resolution? . . . It provides that all persons in the several States shall have equal protection in the right of life, liberty, and property. Now, it is claimed by gentlemen upon the other side of the House that Negroes are citizens of the United States. Suppose that in the State of New Jersey Negroes are citizens, as they are claimed to be by the other side of the House, and they change their residence to the State of South Carolina, if this amendment be passed Congress can pass under it a law compelling South Carolina to grant to Negroes every right accorded to white people there; and as white men there have the right to marry white women, Negroes, under this amendment, would be entitled to the same right; and thus miscegenation and mixture of the races could be authorized in any State, as all citizens under this amendment are entitled to the same privileges and immunities, and the same protection in life, liberty, and property.

"In the State of Pennsylvania there are laws which make a distinction with regard to the schooling of white children and the schooling of black children. It is provided that certain schools shall be designated and set apart for white children, and certain other schools designated and set apart for black children. Under this amendment, Congress would have power to compel the State to provide for white children and black children to attend the same school, upon the principle that all the people . . . shall have equal protection in all the rights of life, liberty, and property, and all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." [136]

Representative Bingham, who was contemporaneously amending the original Trumbull Civil Rights Bill because its broad anti-discrimination provisions lacked constitutional foundation, naturally did not dispute Representative Rogers' appraisal of the wide scope of H. R. 63. On the contrary, Representative Bingham two days later indicated his concurrence in that appraisal in the course of a colloquy with Representative Hale.

Representative Hale inquired of Representative Bingham whether his proposed constitutional amendment did not "confer upon Congress a general power of legislation for the purpose of securing to all persons in the several states protection of life, liberty and property, subject only to the qualification that the protection shall be equal." And Representative Bingham replied, "I believe it does . . ."

In order to nail down the precise source of the proposed grant of power, Representative Hale then asked Representative Bingham to "point me to that clause or part . . . which contains the doctrine he here announces?" To which the answer was, "The words 'equal protection', contain it, and nothing else." [137]

The House at the end of February was preoccupied with debating Reconstruction generally as well as the Civil Rights Bill, and it showed itself in no hurry to take up Bingham's proposal, especially since it was obvious that a more comprehensive measure would soon be forthcoming from the Joint Committee. Following the debate on February 28, the House postponed further consideration of the proposed amendment until mid-April.[138] In fact, "H. R. 63" was not to be heard from in that form again. Yet its protective scope presently passed into the more extensive proposal which the Joint Committee brought forward at the end of April and which became, after some changes, the amendment which Congress finally submitted to the states.

During most of March and April, the Joint Committee paid little attention to the question of civil rights.

It was concerned, for a time, with the question of the admission of Tennessee; then, for a time, it appears to have been inactive. Not until late April did it resume sessions looking forward to the drafting of a comprehensive constitutional amendment on Reconstruction. On April 21, Stevens offered to the committee a draft of a proposed constitutional amendment, covering civil rights, representation, Negro suffrage and the repudiation of the "rebel" debt.

This proposal became the frame upon which the Fourteenth Amendment was constructed. Most significant from our point of view was section 1:

> "No discrimination shall be made by any state, nor by the United States, as to the civil rights of persons because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." [139]

Section 2 provided that on and after July 4, 1876, no discrimination should be made between persons in the rights of suffrage on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. Section 3 provided that until that time, no class of persons against whom a state imposed suffrage discrimination because of race, color or previous condition of servitude should be included in the state's basis of representation. Section 4 invalidated the "rebel" debt. Section 5, which passed substantially intact into the Fourteenth Amendment, provided that Congress was to have the power to enforce the provisions of the amendment by appropriate legislation.[140]

Section 1 was to pass through several critical changes in the next few days. Almost at once, Senator Bingham moved to have the following provision added to section 1:

> "... nor shall any state deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws, nor take private property for public use without just compensation." [141]

[139] KENDRICK, op. cit. supra n. 82, at 83.

[141] Id. at 85.

It will be noticed that Bingham's suggestion had within it the substance of the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. After some discussion, the committee voted this suggestion down, seven to five.

Other changes followed. After some further discussion, Bingham moved that the following be added as a new section of the amendment:

> "No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." [142]

This was substantially Bingham's earlier amendment, submitted to Congress in February as H. R. 63 with the addition of the equal protection clause. One significant difference lay in the fact that Bingham's new section did not confer power upon Congress to legislate; instead, it made privileges and immunities, due process and equal protection constitutional guarantees against state interference.

F. The Republican Majority in the 39th Congress Was Determined to Prevent Future Congresses from Diminishing Federal Protection of These Rights.

There were two rather obvious reasons for Senator Bingham's last two amendments. First, a number of committee members had earlier expressed some concern over the phraseology of H. R. 63 because it allowed Congress to refuse to enforce the guarantees if it saw fit. The Radical Republicans were openly fearful lest later and more conservative Congresses destroy their work.[143] But direct constitutional guarantees would be beyond the power of Congress to impair or destroy. Second, Bingham was acting with the knowledge that section 5 of the proposed amendment already granted Congress full power to legislate to enforce the guarantees of the amendment. In other words, the Radical Republicans had no thought of stripping Congress of the power to enforce the amendment by adequate legislation. They put the guarantees themselves beyond the reach of a hostile Congress.[144]

The Committee at once adopted Representative Bingham's suggested addition by a vote of ten to two.[145] Four days later, however, on April 25, the Committee on Williams' motion, struck out Bingham's latest suggested revision, only Stevens, Bingham, Morrill, Rogers and Blow voting to retain it.[146] On April 28, in the final stages of committee discussion, Bingham moved to strike out section 1, reading "no discrimination shall be made . . ." and insert his proposal of April 21 in its place. Although the Committee had voted only three days earlier to kill Bingham's proposal entirely, it now passed his new motion.[147] Thus, Bingham's proposal ultimately became section 1 of the amendment which the Committee now submitted to Congress. As such, and with the addition of the citizenship clause adopted from the Civil Rights Act of 1866, it was to pass into the Fourteenth Amendment as finally accepted by Congress.

On April 30, Representative Stevens introduced the text of the Committee's proposed amendment in the House of Representatives. As presented, the amendment differed in two particulars from the Fourteenth Amendment as finally adopted: the first section as yet did not contain the citizenship clause; and the third section carried a clause for the complete disfranchisement of Confederate supporters until 1870. An accompanying resolution proposed to make successful ratification of the amendment, together with ratification by the several southern states, a condition precedent to the readmission of the southern states to representation in Congress.[148]

On May 8, Stevens opened debate in the House on the proposed amendment. In a sharp speech he emphasized the legislative power of Congress under the proposed amendment:

> "I can hardly believe that any person can be found who will not admit that every one of these provisions [in the first section] is just. They are all asserted, in some form or other, in our DECLARATION or organic law. But the Constitution limits only the action of Congress, and is not a limitation on the States. This amendment supplies that defect, and allows Congress to correct the unjust legislation of the States, so far that the law which operates upon one man shall operate equally upon all. Whatever law punishes a white man for a crime, shall punish the black man precisely in the same way and to the same degree. Whatever law protects the white man shall afford 'equal' protection to the black man."[149]

The amendment, he added, was made necessary by the "oppressive codes" which had become law in the southern states. "Unless the Constitution should restrain them, those States will all, I fear, keep up this discrimination and crush to death the hated freedmen."[150]

Finally, he stated that the purpose of section 1 was to place the Civil Rights Act beyond the reach of a hostile Congress:

> "Some answer, 'Your civil rights bill secures the same things.' That is partly true, but a law is repealable by a majority. And I need hardly say that the first time that the South with their copperhead allies obtain the command of Congress it will be repealed . . . This amendment once adopted cannot be annulled without two-thirds of Congress. That they will hardly get." [151]

There was general agreement among subsequent speakers that one of the purpose of section 1 of the amendment was to reinforce the Civil Rights Act. Enemies of the proposed amendment charged that Radical Republicans, having forced through what was an unconstitutional statute, were now attempting to clear up the constitutional issue by writing the statute into the supreme law.[152]

The Radical Republicans refused to admit that they were attempting to cover up the passage of an unconstitutional statute. Instead, they insisted that one of the purposes of the present proposed amendment was to place the guarantees of the Civil Rights Act beyond attack by future Congresses unfriendly to the rights of the freedman "The Civil Rights Bill is now part of the law of this land," said Representative James A. Representative Benjamin Boyer of Pennsylvania, another enemy of the amendment, after observing that "the first section embodies the principles of the civil rights bill," twitted the Republicans for seeking to rectify their own constitutional error and attacked the present amendment as "objectionable, also, in its phraseology, being open to ambiguity and admitting the conflicting constructions." Id. at 2467. be a part of the law whenever the sad moment arrives when that gentleman's party comes into power . . . For this reason, and not because I believe the civil rights bill to be unconstitutional, I am glad to see that first section here."[153] Representative John Broomall of Ohio, making the same point, said, "If we are already safe with the civil rights bill, it will do no harm to become the more effectually so, and to prevent a mere majority from repealing the law and thus thwarting the will of the loyal people." Broomall pointed out, also, that no less a friend of the Negro than Representative John A. Bingham, had entertained grave doubts as to the constitutionality of the measure, and thought a constitutional amendment necessary. He disagreed, Broomall said, with Bingham's doubts, but he was not so sure of himself that he felt justified "in refusing to place the power to enact the law unmistakably in the Constitution."[154]

Probably other moderate Republicans agreed with Representative Henry J. Raymond of New York who had voted against the Civil Rights bill because he "regarded it as very doubtful, to say the least, whether Congress, under the existing Constitution had any power to enact such a law. . . ." But he nonetheless had heartily favored the principles and objectives of the bill, and because he still favored "securing an equality of rights to all citizens" he would vote "very cheerfully" for the present amendment.[155]

There was little discussion during the debate in the House of the scope of the civil rights which would be protected by the proposed amendment, apparently because both sides realized that debate on the original Civil Rights Bill had exhausted the issue. The indefatigable Rogers, fighting to the last against any attempt to guarantee rights for the Negro, repeatedly reminded Congress that the amendment would sweep the entire range of civil rights under the protection of the Federal Government and so work a revolution in the constitutional system.[156]

Although it was not necessary to answer Rogers, Bingham reminded Congress:

> "The necessity for the first section of this amendment to the Constitution, Mr. Speaker, is one of the lessons that have been taught to your committee and taught to all the people of this country by the history of the past four years of terrific conflict—that history in which God is, and in which He teaches the profoundest lessons to men and nations. There was a want hitherto, and there remains a want now, in the Constitution of our country, which the proposed amendment will supply. What is that? It is the power in the people, the whole people of the United States, by express authority of the Constitution to do that by congressional enactment which hitherto they have not had the power to do, and have never even attempted to do; that is, to protect by national law the privileges and immunities of all the citizens of the Republic and the inborn rights of every person within its jurisdiction whenever the same shall be abridged or denied by the unconstitutional acts of any State.
>
> Allow me, Mr. Speaker, in passing, to say that this amendment takes from no State any right that ever pertained to it. No State ever had the right, under the forms of law or otherwise, to deny to any freeman the equal protection of the laws or to abridge the privileges or immunities of any citizen of the Republic, although many of them have assumed and exercised the power, and that without remedy." G. Congress Understood That While the Fourteenth Amendment Would Give Authority to Congress to Enforce Its Provisions, the Amendment in and of Itself Would Invalidate All Class Legislation by the States.

On May 10, the House passed the amendment without modification by a vote of 128 to 37. The measure then went to the Senate.[158]

On the same day, Senator Howard opened the debate in the Senate. Speaking for the Joint Committee because of Senator Fessenden's illness, Howard gave a broad interpretation of the first section of the proposed amendment. He emphasized the scope of legislative power which Congress would possess in the enforcement of the Amendment.

> "How will it be done under the present amendment? As I have remarked, they are not [at present] powers granted to Congress, and therefore it is necessary, if they are to be effectuated and enforced, as they assuredly ought to be, that additional power be given to Congress to that end. This is done by the fifth section of this amendment which declares that 'the Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of this article.' Here is a direct affirmative delegation of power to Congress to carry out all the principles of all these guarantees, a power not found in the Constitution." [159]

Senator Howard's interpretation of the legislative power of Congress under the proposed amendment makes it obvious that the Joint Committee, in separating the guarantees of civil rights from the congressional power to legislate thereon, had not at all intended to weaken the legislative capacity of Congress to enforce the rights conferred by the amendment. The guarantees, however, no longer depended upon congressional fiat alone for their effectiveness as they had in Bingham's proposed civil rights amendment of January (H. R. 63). But in Howard's view and that of the Committee, this meant merely that future Congresses could not destroy the rights conferred.

Senator Howard then passed to an equally expansive interpretation of the due process and equal protection clauses of the amendment:

> "The last two clauses of the first section of the amendment disabled a State from depriving not merely a citizen of the United States, but any person, whoever he may be, of life, liberty, or property without due process of law or from denying to him the equal protection of the laws of the State. This abolishes all class legislation in the States and does away with the injustice of subjecting one caste of persons to a code not applicable to another. It prohibits the hanging of a black man for a crime for which the white man is not to be hanged. It protects the black man in his fundamental rights as a citizen with the same shield which it throws over the white man." [160] (Italics added.)

The only class of rights, Howard added, which were not conferred by the first section of the amendment was "the right of suffrage." Howard concluded this analysis by asserting that the entire first section, taken in conjunction with the legislative power of Congress conferred in section five, was of epoch-making importance:

> "I look upon the first section, taken in connection with the fifth, as very important. It will, if adopted by the States, forever disable everyone of them from passing laws trenching upon those fundamental rights and privileges which pertain to citizens of the United States, and to all persons who may happen to be within their jurisdiction. It establishes equality before the law, and it gives to the humblest, the poorest, the most despised of the race the same rights and the same protection before the law as it > gives to the most powerful, the most wealthy, or the most haughty. That, sir, is republican government, as I understand it, and the only one which can claim the praise of a just Government." [161]

Thus, Senator Howard understood that due process and equal protection would sweep away entirely "all class legislation" in the states. By implication, he subscribed to a "substantive interpretation" of due process of law, thus making due process a limitation upon state governments to subvert civil liberties.

No Senator thereafter challenged these sweeping claims for the efficacy of the civil rights portion of Section 1. Howard's allies subscribed enthusiastically to his interpretation. Senator Luke Poland of Vermont, a staunch Radical Republican, regarded the amendment as necessary to set to rest all questions of congressional competence in enacting the civil rights bill:

> "Congress has already shown its desire and intention to uproot and destroy all such partial State legislation in the passage of what is called the civil rights bill. The power of Congress to do this has been doubted and denied by persons entitled to high consideration. It certainly seems desirable that no doubt should be left existing as to the power of Congress to enforce principles lying at the very foundation of all republican government if they be denied or violated by the States. . . ." [162]

Certainly the Conservatives in the Senate agreed altogether with Senator Howard and the other Senate Republicans about the sweeping impact which the prospective amendment would have upon state caste legislation. Senator Thomas Hendricks of Indiana, in condemning the legislative power to enforce the amendment which Congress would acquire from the operation of section 5, said that these words had > "... such force and scope of meaning as that Congress might invade the jurisdiction of the States, rob them of their reserved rights, and crown the Federal Government with absolute and despotic power. As construed this provision is most dangerous." [163]

The prospective amendment moved forward rapidly in the Senate, with comparatively little debate. The Radical Republicans were confident of their objectives. The conservative Republicans and Democrats despaired of arresting the tide of events. One significant change occurred on May 30 when Howard brought forward the citizenship clause of the Civil Rights Act and successfully moved it as an amendment to section 1. Few Republicans doubted that Congress already had the power to legislate upon the question of citizenship. However, the new provision cleared up a serious hiatus in the original Constitution by settling in unequivocal fashion the definition of national and state citizenship. Needless to say, the new provision, like its predecessor in the Civil Rights Act, specifically endowed Negroes with citizenship and reversed the dictum of the Dred Scott case that no Negro could be a citizen of the United States.

The Radical Republicans were well aware that by endowing the Negro with citizenship, they strengthened his claim to the entire scope of civil rights. Bingham had mentioned as much in debate in the House, while Representative Raymond of New York had added that once the Negro became a citizen, it would not be possible in a republican government to deny him any right or to impose upon him any restriction, even including that of suffrage. The force of this stratagem did not escape the Conservatives in the Senate.

[163] Id. at 2940.

Senator Garrett Davis of Kentucky had this to say of the citizenship provision of the amendment:

> "The real and only object of the first provision of this section, which the Senate has added to it, is to make Negroes citizens, to prop the civil rights bill, and give them a more plausible, if not a valid, claim to its provisions, and to press them forward to a full community of civil and political rights with the white race, for which its authors are struggling and mean to continue to struggle." [164]

The Senate passed the amendment in June, 33 to 11. Congress formally proposed the amendment on June 13 and it was submitted to the states.

Congress Intended to Destroy All Class Distinctions In Law

What, then, may one conclude concerning the intent of Congress with regard to segregation in the framing of the amendment?

Both Senator Howard and Representative Stevens made it definitely clear that the scope of the rights guaranteed by the amendment was much greater than that embraced in the Civil Rights Act.

It is evident that the members of the Joint Committee intended to place all civil rights within the protection of the Federal Government and to deny the states any power to interfere with those rights on the basis of color. The scope of the concept of liberties entertained by the Committee was very broad. The breadth of this concept was recognized by this Court in all of its decisions up to Plessy v. Ferguson.

In adopting the Civil Rights Act of 1866, Congress had enumerated the rights protected. This was done because Bingham and others doubted that Congress had the power to take all civil liberties under federal protection. Unrestricted by this consideration in drafting a constitutional provision, Congress used broad comprehensive language to define the standards necessary to guarantee complete federal protection. This was promptly recognized by this Court in one of the earliest decisions construing the Amendment when it was held: "The 14th Amendment makes no effort to enumerate the rights it designs to protect. It speaks in general terms, and those are as comprehensive as possible." Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U. S. 303, 310.

Did Congress specifically intend to ban state laws imposing segregation by race? And more specifically, did it intend to prohibit segregation in school systems, even where a state provided a separate but equal system for Negroes? To begin with it must be recognized that the "separate but equal" doctrine was yet to be born. The whole tenor of the dominant argument in Congress was at odds with any governmentally enforced racial segregation as a constitutionally permissible state practice.

Senator Howard, among others, asserted categorically that the effect of the due process and equal protection clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment would be to sweep away entirely all caste legislation in the United States. Certainly a number of Conservatives, notably Representative Rogers of New Jersey, a member of the Joint Committee and Senator Davis of Kentucky, were convinced that the effect of the amendment would be to prohibit entirely all laws classifying or segregating on the basis of race. They believed, and stated, that school laws providing separate systems for whites and Negroes of the kind which existed in Pennsylvania, Ohio and in several of the Johnson-Reconstructed southern states would be made illegal by the amendment.

It is notable that while there were some assurances extended by Radical Republicans to the Moderates and Conservatives as to the scope of the Civil Rights Act of 1866 in this regard, there were no such assurances in the debates on the Fourteenth Amendment.

The Republican majority realized full well that it could not envisage all possible future applications of the amendment to protect civil rights. By separating section 1 of the amendment, which provides an absolute federal constitutional guarantee for those rights, from section 5, which endows Congress with legislative capacity to protect such rights, the framers of the amendment assured continued protection of these rights, by making it possible to win enforcement of them in the courts and eliminated the power of Congress alone to diminish them.

H. The Treatment of Public Education or Segregation in Public Schools During the 39th Congress Must Be Considered in the Light of the Status of Public Education at That Time.

Although today, compulsory free public education is universally regarded as a basic, appropriate governmental function, there was no such unanimity existing at the time the Fourteenth Amendment was adopted. Arrayed against those who then visualized education as vital to effective government, there were many who still regarded education as a purely private function.

While it has already been shown that the conception of equal protection of the laws and due process of law, developed by the Abolitionists before the Civil War, was so broad that it would necessarily cover such educational segregation as is now before this Court, compulsory public education at that time was the exception rather than the rule. The conception of universal compulsory free education was not established throughout the states in 1866. The struggle for such education went on through most of the 19th century and, even where accepted in principle in some of the states, it sometimes was not fully put into practice.

Prior to the first quarter of the nineteenth century childhood education was considered an individual private responsibility.[165] The period 1830-1860 was one of marked educational advancement. It has commonly been termed as the era of the Common School Revival, a movement to extend and improve facilities for general education. This movement flourished in New England under the leadership of Horace Mann, Henry Barnard and others. There was a definite tendency throughout the country to shift from private to public support of education and this trend extended to normal schools and facilities for secondary and higher education. Many states, urged on by educational leaders, publicists and statesmen, began making legislative provisions for public education.

On the other hand, these gains have been commonly exaggerated and in some respects misinterpreted. The laws were by no means always carried into effect and the recommendations of the reformers were, in most instances, accepted with great hesitancy.[166] Another authority after appraising public education during the period just prior to the Civil War made the following generalizations:

> "Practically all the states were making substantial progress in the development of systems of public education. (2) At the close of the period no single state can be said to have been providing any large percentage of its children and youth with schools well-supported and well-taught. (3) The facilities for secondary education were by no means as extensive as has commonly been reported. (4) Regional differences in educational development have been exaggerated; and (5) where sectional differences in school support and attendance did exist they appear to have been due more to differentials in urban and rural development than to differences in social attitudes and philosophies." [167]

In general, it should be noted that in New England and in New York the main problem during this period was to improve the educational systems which had already been established and to secure additional support for them. In the Middle Atlantic states the major problem was to establish systems of public schools and to provide effective public education. In the West, the prevailing political and social philosophy required that at least some degree of education be provided to as large an element of the population as possible.

Public education was much slower in getting under way in the South. In most of the southern states, despite some promising beginnings, an educational system was not created until after the close of the Civil War. One historian concluded:

> ". . . although the 'common school awakening' which took place in the Northern States after Horace Mann began his work in Massachusetts (1837) was felt in some of the Southern States as well, and although some very commendable beginnings had been made in a few of these States before 1860, the establishment of state educational systems in the South was in reality the work of the period following the close of the Civil War. The coming of this conflict, evident for a decade before the storm broke, tended to postpone further educational development." [168]

Public education in the South made progress only after it became acceptable as being compatible with its ideal of a white aristocracy.[169]

Among the factors responsible for this condition were the aristocratic attitude which held that it was not necessary to educate the masses, the reluctance of the people to tax themselves for educational purposes, the marked individualism of the people, born of isolation, and the imperfect state of social and political institutions. Most southerners saw little or no relation between education and life. Consequently, the view prevailed that those who could afford education could indulge themselves in securing it and those who could not afford it lost little, if anything. This southern attitude was aptly summed up fifteen years after the close of the war by the statement of Virginia's Governor F. W. M. Holliday that public schools were "a luxury . . . to be paid for like any other luxury, by the people who wish their benefits." [170] Education in the South was not so much a process of individual and community improvement as it was an experience that carried with it a presumption of social equality for those who shared it, a view hardly compatible with any notion of universal education which included persons of diverse social and ethnic backgrounds.

Between 1840 and 1860, public education began to advance in the South but its benefits were denied Negroes. It is significant that racist and other types of intolerant legislation increased markedly during this period. While education could be extended to all whites who, for political purposes, belonged to one big happy family, there was nothing in such a conception that suggested that Negroes should be included.[171] The editor of the authoritative antebellum organ of southern opinion, DeBow's Review, summed up the matter of education for Negroes during slavery as follows: "Under the institution of slavery we used to teach them everything nearly except to read." [172]

The framers of the Fourteenth Amendment were familiar with public education, therefore, only as a developing concept. We have already demonstrated that they were determined to eliminate all governmentally imposed racial distinctions—sophisticated as well as simple minded—and expressed their views in the broadest and most conclusive terms. The intentions they expressed were definitely broad enough to proscribe state imposed racial distinctions in public education as they knew it, and the language which they used in the Fourteenth Amendment was broad enough to forever bar racial distinctions in whatever public educational system the states might later develop.

Furthermore, the framers intended that Congress would have the power under section 5 to provide additional sanctions, civil and criminal, against persons who attempted to enforce states statutes made invalid by section 1 of the Amendment. As stated above, Representative Bingham purposely revised an earlier draft of the Amendment so that the prohibitions of section 1 would be self-executing against state statutes repugnant thereto and would be beyond the threat of hostile Congressional action seeking to repeal civil rights legislation. In other words, the judicial power to enforce the prohibitory effect of section 1 was not made dependent upon Congressional action.

Thus, the exercise of this Court's judicial power does not await precise Congressional legislation. This Court has repeatedly declared invalid state statutes which conflicted with section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment, even though Congress had not acted.[173] For example, there

It provides: "Every person who, under color of any statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage, of any State or Territory, subjects, or causes to be subjected, any citizen of the United States or other person within the jurisdiction thereof to the deprivation of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution and laws, shall be liable to the party injured in an action at law, suit in equity, or other proper proceeding for redress." 8 U. is no federal statute to the effect that a state which permits released time for religious instructions is acting in a way prohibited by the Fourteenth Amendment. This Court, nevertheless, held that such state action conflicted with section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment and directed the trial court to enjoin the continuance of the proscribed state action. Illinois ex rel. McCollum v. Board of Education, 333 U. S. 203.

Similarly, this Court has acted to redress violations of constitutional rights, even in the absence of specific Congressional statute, in a long series of cases involving the rights of freedom of expression and freedom of worship under the Fourteenth Amendment. See e.g., De Jonge v. Oregon, 299 U. S. 353. And this Court has often vindicated the constitutional rights of members of minority groups in the area of public education in the absence of any Congressional statute. Sweatt v. Painter, supra.

Indeed, this rule has been applied in all areas in which the prohibitory effect of section 1 has been employed by the Court. E.g., Miller v. Schoene, 276 U. S. 272; McCardle v. Indianapolis Water Co., 272 U. S. 400. To now hold Congressional action a condition precedent to judicial action would be to stultify the provisions in the Federal Constitution protecting the rights of minorities. In effect, this Court would be holding that action by a state against an unpopular minority which the Constitution prohibits cannot be judicially restrained unless the unpopular minority convinces a large majority (the whole country as represented in Congress) that a forum in which to ask relief should be provided for the precise protection they seek.

I. During the Congressional Debates on Proposed Legislation Which Culminated in the Civil Rights Act of 1875 Veterans of the Thirty-Ninth Congress Adhered to Their Conviction That the Fourteenth Amendment Had Proscribed Segregation in Public Schools.

At various times during the 1870's, Congress considered bills for implementing the Fourteenth Amendment as well as the Civil Rights Act of 1866. Debate on these measures was on occasion extremely significant, since it gave members of Congress an opportunity to express themselves as to the meaning and scope of the Amendment. These observations were the more significant in that perhaps two-fifths of the members of both Houses in the early seventies were veterans of the Thirty-ninth Congress which had formulated the Amendment. Moreover, the impact of the Amendment upon segregated schools had by this time moved into the public consciousness so that Congressmen now had an opportunity to say specifically what they thought about the validity under the Amendment of state statutes imposing segregation upon public school systems.

The second session of the Forty-second Congress, which convened in December, 1871, soon found itself involved in a fairly extended discussion of the effect of the Fourteenth Amendment upon racial segregation, particularly in school systems. Early in the session the Senate took under consideration an amnesty bill to restore the political rights of ex-Confederate officials in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of the Amendment. On December 20, Senator Sumner of Massachusetts, now a veteran champion of the rights of the Negro, moved the following as an amendment to the measure under consideration:

> "Section—That all citizens of the United States, without distinction of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, are entitled to the equal and impartial enjoyment of any accommodation, advantage, facility, or privilege furnished by common carriers, whether on land or water; by inn-keepers; > by licensed owners, managers, or lessees of theaters or other places of public amusement; by trustees, commissioners, superintendents, teachers, or other officers of common schools and other public institutions of learning, the same being supported or authorized by law. . . and this right shall not be denied or abridged on any pretense of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." [174]

Here was a provision, which if adopted would commit Congress to the proposition that under the Fourteenth Amendment it could do away entirely with state school statutes providing for segregated school systems. Sumner attacked school segregation at length. The public school, he asserted, "must be open to all or its designation is a misnomer and a mockery. It is not a school for whites or a school for blacks, but a school for all; in other words a common school for all." Segregation he called an "odius discrimination" and an "ill-disguised violation of the principle of Equality." [175]

In the debate that followed, it was apparent that a large majority of the Republicans in the Senate were convinced that Congress quite appropriately might enact such legislation in accordance with section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Senator Carpenter of Wisconsin, one of the best constitutional lawyers in the Upper House, was doubtful of the constitutionality of Sumner's measure insofar as it applied to churches. But he had no doubt on the authority of Congress to guarantee the right of all persons, regardless of race or color, to attend public schools, to use transportation facilities, and the like, and he offered a resolution of his own to this end.[176] Even the conservative Kentuckian Garrett Davis admitted that there was no question of congressional competence under the Amendment to guarantee these rights as against state action, though he challenged the validity of any statute protecting rights against private discrimination.[177] And Senator Stevenson of Kentucky, another strong enemy of mixed schools, confined his attack to discussion of the evil involved in an attempt to "coerce social equality between the races in public schools, in hotels, in theatres. . . ."; he spoke not at all of constitutional objections.[178]

The real objection to Sumner's measure, however, was not the constitutionality of the measure itself, but the incongruity of its attachment as a rider to an amnesty bill, which required a two-thirds majority of both Houses of Congress. Nonetheless, the Senate, after extended debate, adopted Sumner's amendment, including the provision banning segregated schools, by a vote of 28-28, the ballot of the Vice President breaking the tie.[179] The amnesty measure itself later failed to obtain the necessary two-thirds majority of the Senate.

The impressive Senate support in favor of a bill which would have banned segregation in state school systems alarmed Conservatives in both Houses, who now began to advance, very deliberately, the idea that "separate but equal" facilities would be constitutional under the limitations of the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. In the House, a few days after the defeat of the amnesty bill, Representative Frank Hereford of West Virginia offered the following resolution as an expression of conservative sentiment:

> "Be it resolved, That it would be contrary to the Constitution and a tyrannical usurpation of power for Congress to force mixed schools upon the States, and equally unconstitutional and tyrannical for Con-

There was no debate on the Hereford resolution, which was put to an immediate vote and defeated, 85 to 61, 94 not voting.[180]

Later in the session, there was still further debate in the Senate concerning segregated schools. With a second amnesty bill up for consideration, Sumner on May 8 again moved an amendment providing:

> "That no citizen of the United States shall, by reason of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, be excepted or excluded from the full and equal enjoyment of any accommodation, advantage, facility, or privilege furnished by inn-keepers; by common carriers . . . or . . . by trustees, commissioners, superintendents, teachers, and other officers of common schools and other public institutions of learning, the same being supported by moneys derived from general taxation, or authorized by law. . . ." [181]

This proposal led to sharp debate and decided differences of opinion among the Republican majority. Senator Trumbull of Illinois, who was the author of the Civil Rights Act of 1866 and who had become decidedly more conservative in his political outlook since the early Reconstruction era, now insisted that the right to attend public schools was in any event not a civil right, so that Congress could not legislate on the subject under the Fourteenth Amendment. But Senator George Edmunds of Vermont, already known as a distinguished constitutional lawyer and who had entered the Senate in 1866 in time to participate in the debates on the Fourteenth Amendment, dissented sharply, insisting that the right to attend tax-supported public schools was a civil right and therefore subject to regulation by Congress.[182] Senator Morton taking the same view, insisted that "if the right to participate in these schools is to be governed by color, I say that it is a fraud upon those who pay the taxes." And he added that where there are public schools supported by common taxation upon everybody, white and black, then there is a civil rights that there shall be equal participation in those schools.

Observing that the Ohio Supreme Court had but lately held constitutional a state statute providing for segregation in public schools, he argued that Congress was entirely competent under the Fourteenth Amendment to prohibit segregated schools.

Senator Arthur Boreman of West Virginia also took it as a matter of course that Congress had the power under the amendment to prohibit separate but equal facilities in school systems; he thought that Congress ought not to force the issue at present:

> "The time will come when . . . these distinctions will pass away in all the States, when school laws will be passed without this question appearing upon the face of those laws; but it is not so now, and for the present I am willing to allow the laws of the State to remain as they are where they provide schools for both classes." [183]

At the close of the debate, the proponents of segregated school systems tried unsuccessfully to modify the Sumner measure to eliminate the requirement for mixed school systems. Senator Orris Ferry of Connecticut first moved to strike out entirely the provisions of the Sumner amendment which related to public school systems. This motion the Senate defeated 26 to 25.[184] Senator Francis P. Blair of Missouri then offered another amendment to allow "local option" elections within the states on the question of mixed versus segregated schools. Sumner, Edmunds and Howe all strongly condemned this proposal, which the border and southern Senators as strongly commended. The Blair amendment in turn met defeat, 23 to 30.[185] Finally, an amendment to strike out the first five sections of the Sumner measure, thereby completely destroying its effect, was defeated 29 to 29, with the Vice President casting a deciding negative vote.[186] The Senate then formally adopted the Sumner amendment to the amnesty bill, 28 to 28, with the Vice President voting in the affirmative.[187]

The conclusion seems inescapable that as of 1872 a substantial majority of the Republican Senators and perhaps half of the Senate at large believed that the prohibitions of the Fourteenth Amendment extended to segregated schools.

The authority of the judiciary to act in this field was specifically recognized and not disputed.[188] A significant number of the Senators in question, among them Edmunds, Howe, Sumner, Conkling, and Morrill, had been in Congress during the debates on the adoption of the Amendment, while Conkling and Morrill had been members of the Joint Committee. And Vice President Henry Wilson, who several times cast a deciding vote in favor of prohibiting segregated schools not only had been in Congress during the debates on the Amendment but had also authored one of the early civil rights bills of the Thirty-ninth Congress.

The first session of the Forty-third Congress, which opened in December, 1873, saw extended discussion of the issue of segregated schools in both Houses. On December 18, Representative Benjamin F. Butler of Massachusetts, chairman of the House Judiciary Committee and long one of the most outspoken leaders of the Radical faction of the Republican party, introduced the following measure from his committee:

> ". . . whoever, being a corporation or natural person and owner, or in charge of any public inn, or of any place of public amusement or entertainment for which a license from any legal authority is required, or of any line of stage-coaches, railroad, or other means of public carriage of passengers or freight, or of any cemetery or other benevolent institution, or any public school supported in whole or in part at public expense or by endowment for public use, shall make any distinction as to admission or accommodation therein of any citizen of the United States because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, shall, on conviction thereof, be fined not less than $100 nor more than $5000 for each offense. . . ." [189]

This measure inspired a somewhat bitter two-day debate early in January, 1874, during which the power of Congress to prohibit segregated schools received more attention than any other single issue involved. The most extended defense of the constitutionality of Butler's measure was made by Representative William Lawrence of Ohio, who began with the flat assertion that "Congress has the constitutional power to pass this bill." Denying that civil rights were any longer in the exclusive care of the states, he asserted that since the passage of the Fourteenth Amendment, "if a state permits any inequality in rights to be created or meted out by citizens or corporations enjoying its protection, it denied the equal protection of laws." He then launched into an extended historical analysis of the debates in the Thirty-ninth Congress before and during the passage of the Amendment. He recalled Bingham's statement in opposition to the original extreme language of the Civil Rights bill, in which the Ohioan had said that the proper remedy for state violation of civil rights was to be achieved not by an "arbitrary assumption of power," but "by amending the Constitution of the United States expressly prohibiting the States from any such abuse of power in the future." He quoted Stevens' and Howard's speeches introducing the Amendment in Congress to show the broad purpose which they had represented to be the objectives of the Joint Committee. In some irony, he quoted various conservatives in the House, among them Finck, Boyer and Shanklin, who had asserted again and again that the Amendment would place all civil rights within the protective custody of the federal government.[190] Lawrence's speech was the more impressive in that he was a veteran of the Thirty-ninth Congress who had actively supported both the Civil Rights Act and the passage of the Fourteenth Amendment. Moreover, he was held in great respect in Congress as an able jurist and constitutional lawyer.[191]

The most extended argument in opposition to Lawrence was advanced by Representative Roger Q. Mills of Texas, who presented the contention that civil rights, in spite of the Fourteenth Amendment, were still entrusted entirely to the care of the states. Congress, he thought, had no right to touch the public school system of the several states. "The States," he said, "have . . . [an] unquestioned right . . . to establish universities, colleges, academies, and common schools, and govern them according to their own pleasure." He relied upon the narrow interpretation of the "privileges or immunities" clause of the Fourteenth Amendment recently advanced by the Supreme Court in the Slaughter House Cases as a new argument in support of his contention. And he finished with the warning, not entirely unheard in the twentieth century, that if Congress passed any such measure as the Butler bill, "the Legislatures of every State where the white people have control will repeal the common-school laws." [192] At the end of debate, Butler's bill was recommitted on the motion of its sponsor, and was not heard of again during the session.

More significant events were occurring in the Senate. On December 2, Sumner had once more presented his now well-known civil rights measure, this time as an independent Senate bill instead of a proposed amendment to an amnesty resolution.[193] This bill finally came up for debate in late April and May, although Sumner himself had died in March. Conkling of New York, Boutwell of Massachusetts, Howe of Wisconsin, Edmunds of Vermont, and Frelinghuysen of New Jersey all gave it very effective support in debate.[194]

In a strong speech, Senator Frelinghuysen pointed out that a variety of conflicting state decisions had introduced some confusion into the question of whether or not state statutes setting up segregated school systems were constitutional under the Amendment. The present measure, he thought, would destroy "injurious agitation" on that subject. There could be no question of the constitutional power of Congress to enact the bill; the "privileges or immunities" and "the equal protection" clauses, in particular, were especially germane to congressional power. And he pointed out that if the present bill became law, it would still be possible to pursue an informal voluntary segregation by the consent of both parents and school boards, where for a time that seemed advisable. But he added that segregated school systems established by law were in complete violation of the whole spirit of the Amendment; separate schools for colored people were inevitably inferior to those for whites. "Sir", he said in conclusion, "if we did not intend to make the colored race full citizens . . . we should have left them slaves." [195]

Senator Edmunds used both constitutional and pragmatic arguments in support of the bill. "What the Constitution authorizes us to do is to enforce equality," he said, "and . . . not half-equality, for there is no such thing as half-equality. It is entire equality or none at all." And segregated schools imposed inequality on Negroes. He quoted figures from Georgia school statistics, to demonstrate that although forty-three percent of the children in that state were colored, there were nonetheless only 356 schools for colored children as against 1379 for whites. In the light of this kind of evidence, he thought, the duty of Congress was clear.[196]

Senator Boutwell declared that "opening the public schools of this country to every class and condition of people without distinction of race and color, is security . . . that . . . the rising . . . generations will advance to manhood with the fixed purpose of maintaining these principles [of the Republic]." Like Edmunds, he argued that segregation made either adequate or equal facilities impossible; there was not enough money in the South to support two school systems.[197]

Senator Howe asserted that ". . . I am of the opinion that the authority of Congress to issue these commands, to enact this bill into law, is as clear, as indisputable as its authority to lay taxes or do any other one thing referred to in the Constitution." Like Frelinghuysen he thought that voluntary segregation might exist in some places for a time without violating the amendment. "Open two school houses wherever you please;" he said, and "furnish in them equal accommodations and equal instruction, and the whites will for a time go by themselves, and the colored children will go by themselves for the same reason, because each will feel more at home by themselves than at present either can feel with the other. . . ." But legally segregated schools, he thought would not in fact be equal, and it was the duty of Congress to prohibit them.[198]

Senator Pease of Mississippi shortly before the bill was passed speaking in favor of the bill said in unequivocal terms:

> "The main objection that has been brought forward by the opponents of this bill is the objection growing out of mixed schools. . . . There has been a great revolution in public sentiment in the South during the last three or four years, and I believe that to-day a majority of the southern people are in favor of supporting, maintaining, and fostering a system of common education . . . I believe that the people of the South so fully recognize this, that if this measure shall become a law, there is not a State south of Mason and Dixon's line that will abolish its school system. . . .
> * * * I say that whenever a State shall legislate that the races shall be separated, and that legislation is based upon color or race, there is a distinction made; it is a distinction the intent of which is to foster a concomitant of slavery and to degrade him. The colored man understands and appreciates his former condition; and when laws are passed that say that 'because you are a black man you shall have a separate school,' he looks upon that, and justly, as tending to degrade him. There is no equality in that.

The opponents of the Sumner bill meantime had become aware of the epoch-making significance of the Supreme Court's decision in the Slaughter House Cases, and they leaned very heavily upon Justice Miller's opinion during the debate. Thurman of Ohio analysed the Slaughter House Cases at length to prove his former contention that the main body of civil rights was still in the custody of the states and that the present bill was unconstitutional."[200] Senator Henry Cooper of Tennessee, after citing Justice Miller's opinion to make the same constitutional point, asked the Republican majority, ". . . what good are you to accomplish thus by forcing the mixture of the races in schools?"[201] And Senator Saulsbury of Delaware, who, in 1866 had insisted that if Congress enacted the Fourteenth Amendment it would work an entire revolution in state-federal relations, now argued flatly that the Sumner bill was unconstitutional under Justice Miller's interpretation of the limited scope of the "privileges or immunities" clause of the Amendment.[202]

However, the Senate majority remained firm in its intention to pass the bill with the ban on segregated schools. At the close of debate, Senator Aaron Sargent of California presented an amendment that "nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit any State or school district from providing separate schools for persons of different sex or color, where such separate schools are equal in all respects to others of the same grade established by such authority, and supported by an equal pro rata expenditure of school funds." This amendment the Senate promptly defeated, 21 to 26.[203] Senator McCreery then moved an amendment providing that "nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to apply to schools already established." This, too, met defeat, mustering but eleven "ayes" in its support.[204] Immediately after this, the Senate, on May 22, passed the Sumner bill, by a vote of 29 to 16, and sent it to the House.[205]

Again the conclusion with respect to congressional intent as regards segregated schools seems fairly clear: a majority of the Senate in the Forty-third Congress, under control of leaders, a number of whom had supported the passage of the Fourteenth Amendment eight years earlier, thought Congress had the constitutional power to ban segregated schools and that it would be good national policy to do so.[206]

Congress adjourned before the House could take action on the Sumner bill, so that the measure carried over to the second session of the Congress, beginning in December, 1874. And now occurred a curious anticlimax with respect to the prohibition of segregated schools; Congress speedily enacted what virtually amounted to the Sumner bill of 1874 into law, but with the provision banning segregated schools eliminated from the bill.

The critical action occurred in the House of Representatives, where Butler on December 16 introduced what amounted to a somewhat modified draft of the measure passed by the Senate the previous spring. The constitutional debates produced little that was new. It was apparent that Congress by virtue of Section 5 had the constitutional power to take all civil liberties under its protection. Representative Robert Hale of New York, a veteran of the Thirty-ninth Congress, twitted Finck of Ohio for his fallible memory in forgetting so conveniently that in 1866, he had solemnly warned that the impending amendment would place all civil rights under federal protection.[207]

Whatever may be said about the quantum or quality of Congressional debates on one side or the other no one can deny that the 39th Congress opened with a determination on the part of the Radical Republican majority to deprive the states of all power to maintain racial distinctions in governmental functions. No one can gainsay that this determination permeated the 39th Congress and continued through the passage adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment. The debates and all of the related materials show conclusively that the Fourteenth Amendment effectively gave constitutional sanction to the principle that states are thereby deprived of all power to enforce racial distinctions in governmental functions including public schools.

II

There is convincing evidence that the State Legislatures and conventions which ratified the Fourteenth Amendment contemplated and understood that it prohibited State legislation which would require racial segregation in public schools.

The Fourteenth Amendment was submitted to the states for consideration on June 16, 1866. 14 Stat. 358. It was deliberated by thirty-seven states and ratified by thirty-three.[208] We urge that the evidence with respect to the states' understanding indicates that three-fourths of the states understood and contemplated the Amendment to forbid legislation compelling the assignment of white and Negro youth to separate schools.

The evidence which compels this conclusion is adduced from governors' messages, reports of the legislative committees on federal relations and entries in the journals of the legislatures. At that time, the legislatures, almost without exception, kept no verbatim record of debates and speeches; and the journals merely noted motions and votes. There are, however, newspaper summaries of some speeches and proceedings. But much of the evidence from these sources is inadequate.

More significant is the modifications which the states made in their schools laws. For if it was understood in the legislatures, which considered the proposed Amendment, that ratification would perforce forbid compulsory segregated schools, it seems certain that the legislatures would have apprehended its effect upon the state's constitutional or statutory provisions for public schools. If, for example, a state required or authorized segregated schools under existing law, presumably the legislature would not knowingly adopt the Amendment without giving some thought to its implications. After adoption, it would be expected that measures would be taken to conform the school laws to the new constitutional mandate. If, however, a state's school laws and practices already conformed to the understanding that the Fourteenth Amendment forbade segregated schools, it is probable that its legislature would not have objected to the Amendment on this question and would afterwards either retain or reinforce its school laws. On the other hand, if there was an authorization or requirement of segregation in a state's school laws, and, after ratification, the legislature took no action to end this disparity, undoubtedly it would appear that this state did not understand the Amendment to have the effect which Appellants urge. Yet, if a state under these same conditions had rejected the Amendment, it would suggest that the Amendment's impact upon the school segregation law was a controlling factor. We submit, the new constitutional and statutory provisions enacted with respect to public schools during the critical period, i.e., from 1866, the year the Amendment was submitted, until several years following adoption, constitute strong evidence on the question of the understanding of the Amendment in the state legislatures.

Then, too, we note that the Fourteenth Amendment was designed particularly as a limitation upon the late Confederate States. Slaughter House Cases, 16 Wall. 36. Each of them, except Tennessee, was required to endorse the Amendment and the price of readmission also required each to demonstrate that it "modified its constitution and laws in conformity therewith." 14 Stat. 428 (Act of March 2, 1867). In this connection, Representative Boutwell significantly declared: [209]

> "We are engaged in the great work of reconstructing this Government, and I suppose if we are committed to anything, it is this: that in the ten States not now represented there shall hereafter be no distinction on account of race or color."

These new constitutions, and the proposals and debates of the conventions which framed them, then are of utmost significance. Certainly, they had to measure up to the requirements of the Fourteenth Amendment and, therefore, their educational provisions apparently reflect the understanding of the draftsmen as to the Amendment's effect upon compulsory public school segregation. Similarly, since the constitutions of these states, were subject to the scrutiny of Congress, an additional insight into the understanding of Congress is provided. For it would hardly be possible to maintain that Congress contemplated the Fourteenth Amendment as a prohibition on compulsory segregated schools if it had approved a constitution having a provision inconsistent with this proposition.

We now turn to the legislative history of the Fourteenth Amendment in the states. The proceedings in the several states shall be taken up in turn. Because of the geographic origin of certain of the instant cases and the significance of the contemporary understanding and contemplation of the effect of the Amendment upon Southern institutions, we will first treat the evidence from the states whose readmission to the Union was conditioned upon their conformity with the Amendment.

A. The Eleven States Seeking Readmission Understood that the Fourteenth Amendment Stripped Them of Power to Maintain Segregated Schools.

Subsequent to the proclamation of the Thirteenth Amendment the South sought to define the relations between the new freedmen and white men in a manner which retained most of the taint of the former master-slave relationship. The ante-bellum constitutions remained inviolate although prohibitions against slavery were added. Laws were passed which restricted Negroes in their freedom of movement, employment, and opportunities for learning. Slaughter House Cases, 16 Wall. 36, 71-72; Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U. S. 303, 306-307. In Arkansas [210] and Florida,[211] the so-called Black Codes required separate schools for the children of the two races.

After March 2, 1867, the date of the First Reconstruction Act, 14 Stat. 428, the South was obliged to redefine the status of the freedmen in conformity with their understanding of the Fourteenth Amendment. New constitutions were adopted which without exception were free of any requirement or specific authorization of segregated schools. It is also significant that in almost all of these constitutional conventions and legislatures, the issue of segregated schools was specifically raised and rejected. And no law compelling segregated schools was enacted in any state until after it had been readmitted.

Arkansas

The first of these states to be readmitted was Arkansas. 15 Stat. 72 (Act of June 22, 1868). The constitution which it submitted to Congress had not one reference to race; the education article merely obligated the general assembly to "establish and maintain a system of free schools for all persons" of school age.[212] It is reported that this article was adopted to nullify the segregated school law passed by the legislature earlier in 1867.[213] Its adoption had been generally opposed in the Convention on the ground that it would "establish schools in which there would be 'indiscriminate social intercourse between whites and blacks.'"[214] The electorate was warned that this constitution would "force children into mixed schools."[215] But the new constitution was adopted and proclaimed law on April 1, 1868.[216]

The general assembly convened on April 3, and ratified the Fourteenth Amendment on April 6, 1868.[217] It then proceeded to repeal the former school statute and a new school law was proposed whereby taxes were to be assessed to support a system of common schools for the education of all children. This law was interpreted as establishing "a system of schools where the two races are blended together."[218] And it was attacked because it granted white

These provisions for public schools were included in the legislative record which Arkansas submitted to the scrutiny of Congress. Whereupon, Arkansas was re-admitted on June 22, 1868. 15 Stat. 72. One month later, but after readmission, the legislature amended the public school statute and directed the Board of Education to "make the necessary provisions for establishing separate schools for white and colored children and youths. . . ." North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, Alabama and Florida.

The North Carolina, South Carolina, Louisiana, Georgia, Alabama and Florida modifications in their constitutions and laws were approved by Congress in the Omnibus Act of June 25, 1868 and Congress authorized readmittance effective on the date each ratified the Amendment. 15 Stat. 73. The constitution which Florida offered for congressional review imposed a specific duty on the state to provide "for the education of all children residing within its borders without distinction or preference." [221] The legislature ratified the Amendment on June 9, 1868 and when it next convened passed a law to maintain "a uniform system of instruction, free to all youth of six to twenty-one years." [222] It is agreed that this law was not designed to foster segregated schools and by its operation "mixed schools were authorized or required." [223]

Several years later the Florida Legislature passed a sweeping law which forbade any racial distinction in the full and equal enjoyment of public schools, conveyances, accommodations and amusements.[224] The first compulsory school segregation provision did not appear until over twenty years after readmission.[225]

In the North Carolina Constitution of 1868, the education article called for the general assembly to maintain "a general and uniform system of public schools, wherein tuition shall be free of charge to all the children of the State between the ages of six and sixteen."[226] Furthermore, the general assembly was "empowered to enact that every child of sufficient mental and physical ability, shall attend the public schools" unless otherwise educated.[227] It is reported that the Constitutional Convention refused by a vote of 86 to 11 to adopt a section which provided that "The General Assembly shall provide separate and distinct schools for the black children of the state, from those provided for white children."[228] The adopted article also survived amendments which would have permitted separate schools "for any class of the population" providing each class shared equally in the school fund.[229] Some proponents of the education article said that it did not force racial commingling but they frankly admitted that it did not prevent it and contended that separate schools, if established, should only develop out of the mutual agreement of parents rather than through legislation.[230] Available contemporary comment upon the education article of the 1868 constitution uniformly agreed that it either authorized or required mixed schools.[231]

The 1868 Constitution, with this education article, was submitted to Congress and treated as being in conformity with the Amendment. North Carolina's readmission was thus assured contingent upon its ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The state legislature convened on July 1, 1868 and ratified the Amendment on July 4th.[232] Three days later the lower house adopted a resolution providing for the establishment of separate schools, but it failed to win support in the upper house which successfully carried a resolution instructing the Board of Education to prepare a code for the maintenance of the system of free public schools contemplated in the constitution.[233] Significantly, this measure made no reference to race. It was enrolled on July 28, 1868.[234]

At the next regular session after readmission, the legislature passed a school law which required separate schools.[235] However doubtful the validity of this law was to some as late as 1870,[236] the state constitution as amended in 1872, settled the issue by specifically requiring racial separation in education.[237]

South Carolina and Louisiana both ratified the Amendment on July 9, 1868 and were readmitted as of that date pursuant to the Omnibus Act. 15 Stat. 73. The educational articles in their 1868 constitutions were of the same cloth. The Louisiana article flatly said: "There shall be no separate schools or institutions of learning established exclusively for any race by the State of Louisiana."[238] South Carolina's constitution provided that: "All the public schools, colleges and universities of this State, supported in whole or in part by the public school fund, shall be free and open to all the children and youths of the State, without regard to race or color."[239] In addition to this, the South Carolina Constitution required the legislature to pass a compulsory school law after it organized facilities for the education of all children.[240] The 1868 constitutions of both states also declared that all citizens, without regard to race or color, were entitled to equal civil and political rights.[241]

The proponents of the education articles in the Louisiana and South Carolina conventions defended the provisions prohibiting segregation by force of law in public schools as an incident of equal justice or equal benefits in return for equal burdens; and they overwhelmingly considered compulsory segregation to be a hostile distinction based on race and previous condition.[242] The chairman of the Education Committee of the South Carolina Convention, defending the proposed education article, explained:[243]

Continuing, he explained:[244]

> "We only compel parents to send their children to some school, not that they shall send them with the colored children; we simply give those colored children who desire to go to white schools, the privilege to do so." (Emphasis supplied.)

After the Louisiana and South Carolina constitutions were approved by Congress, the South Carolina Legislature, in a special session, ratified the Amendment and temporarily organized the school system in conformity with the education article, despite Governor Scott's plea for a law which would require racial separation in schools as a preventive against "educational miscegenation."[245] At the next regular session, the school system was permanently organized, and a law was passed forbidding officials of the state university to "make any distinction in the admission of students or management of the university on account of race, color or creed."[246]

The Louisiana legislature acted with similar celerity and consistency. It assembled on June 29, 1868, ratified the Amendment on July 9, 1868 and enacted laws conforming to the constitutional mandate against segregated schools.[247] At its next session, it supplemented the school laws by imposing penal and civil sanctions against any teacher refusing to accept a pupil of either race.[248] Subsequent laws forbade racial distinctions at a state institution for the instruction of the blind, prohibited racial separation on common carriers, and provided that there should be no racial discrimination in admission, management and discipline at an agricultural and mechanical college.[249]

More than a quarter-century elapsed before South Carolina and Louisiana in 1895 and 1898, respectively, changed these laws to require racial segregation in public education.[250]

The Alabama Constitutional Convention assembled on November 4, 1867, but the education article was not adopted until December 5th, the final day of the session. What emerged was borrowed directly from the Iowa Constitution of 1857, in most particulars, plus the language of a statute passed by the 1865-66 Iowa legislature to specifically bar segregation in schools.[251] This anti-segregation article survived two attempts to introduce provisos specifically requiring the establishment of separate schools.[252]

Congress found that Alabama had conformed its constitution with the Amendment and considered the state qualified for readmission as soon as it ratified the Fourteenth Amendment. On July 13th, 1868, the General Assembly fulfilled the final requirement. Thereafter, on August 11th, the State Board of Education, acting under the legislative powers conferred upon it in the constitution, passed a regulation which made it unlawful "to unite in one school both colored and white children, unless it be by the unanimous consent of the parents and guardians of such children . . ."[253] But the significant point again is that this was done only after readmission.

Georgia, like most of the South, had no public school system prior to Reconstruction. In fact, no reference to public schools appears in either the ante-bellum Georgia Constitution or the Constitution of 1865 which was substantially a reenactment of the former.[254]

The Constitutional Convention of 1867-68, however, rewrote the basic state document and the committee on education reported a proposal to establish a thorough system of public education "without partiality or distinction."[255] During the drafting and consideration of the proposed education article, several efforts to include provisions requiring segregated schools were defeated.[256] The Convention adopted an article which directed the General Assembly to "provide a thorough system of general education to be forever free to all children of the State . . .".[257]

After this constitution was approved by Congress, the legislature ratified the Fourteenth Amendment on July 21, 1868 and Georgia apparently qualified for readmission. But the General Assembly forcibly expelled its Negro complement at this session on the ground that their color

This action prompted Congress to refuse to seat the Georgia congressional delegation.[258] The General Assembly then reconvened on January 10, 1870, re-seated its Negro members, ratified the Fourteenth Amendment again, and expunged the word "white" from all state laws.[259] The conduct of this legislature satisfied Congress and Georgia was readmitted to the Union on July 15, 1870. 16 Stat. 363.

Three months later, on October 13, 1870, the state legislature passed a public school act which in section 32 established a system of segregated schools.[260] The state constitution was amended in 1877 and validated this legislation by an express requirement for racial separation in public schools.[261] education, "when in their opinion the harmony and success of the schools require it, . . . may make any separation of the students or schools necessary to secure success in operation . . . ".[265] Contemporary opinion was that this grant of discretion to school boards was a restrained effort to achieve racial separation without offending Congress and that the Fourteenth Amendment forbade the requirement of separate schools although it did not compel mixed schools.[266] It was not until 1876, when Texas adopted a new constitution, that racial separation in schools was expressly required by law.[267]

Virginia.

Virginia submitted to Congress a constitution which contained no reference to race or racial separation in public schools.[268] In the Constitutional Convention, the issue of segregation was introduced when the report of the committee on education was being considered. First, an amendment was proposed to provide "that in no case shall white and colored children be taught in the same school."[269] This amendment was defeated.[270] Subsequently, a proposal to add an independent section providing for the establishment of segregated schools met a like fate.[271] A provision was also submitted to require that public schools be open to all classes without distinction and that the legislature be denied the power to make any law which would admit of any invidious distinctions.[272] This proposal and a substitute to the same effect were also defeated.[273] Opponents of the proposals to prohibit segregated schools explained the failure of passage, not on the grounds of fundamental objection, but because it was feared that the adoption of such an article in the constitution would doom its chance of ratification.[274] Thus, an article merely directing the general assembly to provide for a uniform system of public free schools was adopted "rather than risk having the Congress or Union Leagues force an obnoxious law on them." [275]

After the election of 1869, at which the constitution was adopted, the General Assembly convened and ratified the Fourteenth Amendment on October 8, 1869. This session passed no school laws and the establishment of the public school system was deferred until after readmission. Full statehood status was regained on January 26, 1870. 16 Stat. 62. Six months later, on June 11th, the General Assembly established a "uniform system of schools" in which separate schools were required.[276] A specific constitutional mandate for segregated[277] schools, however, did not appear until 1902.

Mississippi.

Mississippi followed the general pattern of the former seceded states. The Constitutional Convention of 1868, adopted an education article which made no mention of race or racial separation.[278] At least two unsuccessful attempts were also made in the Convention to require segregated schools.[279]

While the convention journal does not specifically indicate that the Fourteenth Amendment was raised as an objection to segregated schools, the convention had passed a resolution which declared that:

> ". . . the paramount political object . . . is the restoration or reconstruction of our government upon a truly loyal and national basis, or a basis which will secure liberty and equality before the law, to all men, regardless of race, color or previous conditions." [280]

The convention also framed a Bill of Rights which required all public conveyances to accord all persons the same rights,[281] and it refused to adopt an article forbidding intermarriage.[282]

The next legislature convened in January, 1870, ratified the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments, repealed all laws relative to Negroes in the Code of 1857, as amended by the Black Code of 1865, and indicated that it intended to remove all laws "which in any manner recognize any natural difference or distinction between citizens and inhabitants of the state." [283]

The Constitution and actions of the legislature proved acceptable to Congress, and Mississippi was restored to the Union on February 23, 1870. 16 Stat. 77. It was not until 1878 that Mississippi passed a law requiring segregated

Tennessee.

Tennessee, although a member state in the late Confederacy, was not subjected to the requirements of the First Reconstruction Act, inasmuch as it had promptly ratified the Fourteenth Amendment and had been readmitted prior to the passage of that Act. Nevertheless, this state likewise reentered the Union with compulsory racial segregation absent from its constitution and statutory provisions on public schools. Readmission was under the Constitution of 1834, inasmuch as the Constitutional Convention of 1865 merely amended it to abrogate slavery and authorize the general assembly to determine the qualifications of the exercise of the elective franchise.[286] The education article in this constitution merely required the legislature to encourage and support common schools "for the benefit of all the people" in the state.[287] The first law providing for tax supported schools, on its face, also made no racial distinction.[288] The next law, however, prohibited compulsory integrated schools.[289] Contemporary federal authorities noted that ante-bellum practice apparently had restricted the benefits of the school system to white children; but approved these provisions because, in sum, they provided a sufficient guarantee for the support and enjoyment of common schools for the equal benefit of all the people without distinction on the basis of race or color.[290]

The Governor convened the legislature in special session on July 4, 1866 to consider the Fourteenth Amendment. In urging its adoption, he summarized Section 1, and said that its practical effect was to protect the civil rights of Negroes and to "prevent unjust and oppressive discrimination" in the exercise of these citizenship rights.[291] A joint resolution to ratify was introduced in the upper house; and a resolution to amend it with a proviso that the proposed Amendment should not be construed to confer upon a person of color rights to vote, to hold office, to sit on juries or to intermarry with whites or to "prevent any state from enacting and enforcing such laws" was voted down.[292] Then the Senate approved the joint resolution and the House concurred.[293]

After ratification, a group in the lower house formally protested its confirmation of the Amendment on the ground that it invaded state rights "and obliterates all distinctions in regard to races, except Indians not taxed."[294] A similar protest was filed in the upper house.[295] Such of the debates as were reported in the press indicate that the legislators understood the Amendment to force absolute equality[296] and that under the inhibitions of Section 1 "distinctions in Tennessee was readmitted July 24, 1866. 15 Stat. 708-711. After readmission, a school law was passed on March 5, 1867 whereby boards of education were "authorized and required to establish . . . special schools for colored children, when the whole number by enumeration exceeds twenty-five." [298] It also provided for the discontinuance of these separate schools when the enrollment fell below fifteen. The law, however, did not forbid non-segregated schools. But it was repealed in 1869 and replaced with a requirement that racial separation in schools be observed without exception.[299] Finally, the constitution was amended in 1870 to secure the same result.[300]

In summary, therefore, as to these eleven states the evidence clearly reveals that the Fourteenth Amendment was understood as prohibiting color distinctions in public schools.

B. The Majority of the Twenty-two Union States Ratifying the 14th Amendment Understood that it Forbade Compulsory Segregation in Public Schools.

Other than the states already treated, twenty-six Union States considered the Amendment. Twenty-two of them ratified it. The evidence adduced here is of a somewhat less uniform character than that from the states which formed the late Confederacy for the simple reason that the legislatures in the North were unfettered by any congressional surveillance, and they did not experience the imperative necessity of re-examining their constitutions and laws at the time the proposed Fourteenth Amendment was considered by them. Thus, it is to be expected that some of these legislatures deferred attuning their school laws with the keynote of the Amendment until several years after it had become the law of the land. In other states, the legislatures adjusted their school laws almost simultaneously with their ratification of the Amendment. Still others, because existing laws and practices conformed with their basic understanding with respect to the impact of the Amendment, were not required to act. In the end, nevertheless, we submit that the overwhelming majority of the Union States ratified or did not ratify the Fourteenth Amendment with an understanding or contemplation that it commanded them to refrain from compelling segregated schools and obliged them to conform their school laws to assure consistency with such an understanding.

West Virginia and Missouri.

West Virginia, a state created during the Civil War when forty western counties refused to follow Virginia down the road to secession, and Missouri, a former slaveholding state comprised the small minority of states which ratified the Fourteenth Amendment and perpetuated laws requiring segregated schools without any subsequent enactment consistent with a discernment that such laws and the Amendment were incompatible.

Both states required separate schools for the two races prior to the submission of the Amendment.[301] These laws were continued after the Amendment was proclaimed as ratified;[302] and both states subsequently strengthened the requirement of separate schools in the 1870's by amending their constitutions to specifically proscribe racial integration in public schools.[303]

The New England States.

Segregated schools also existed in some of the strongly abolitionist New England states prior to their consideration and ratification of the Amendment. But their reaction to the prohibitions of Section 1 was directly contrary to the course taken in West Virginia and Missouri.

In Connecticut, prior to the adoption of the Amendment, racial segregation was not required by state law but segregated schools were required in some cities and communities, e.g., in Hartford pursuant to an ordinance enacted in 1867 and in New Haven by administrative regulation.[304] On August 1, 1868, four days after the Amendment was proclaimed, however, the legislature expressly forbade separate schools.[305] Interestingly, during the course of debate on this bill, amendments which would have required segregation or permitted separate "equal" schools were introduced and rejected.[306]

Similarly, racial separation in schools was never required by the constitution or laws of Rhode Island, but segregated schools existed at least in Providence, Newport and Bristol.[307] Here, too, the same legislature which ratified the Amendment enacted a law prohibiting racial segregation in public schools.[308]

In Maine, there was no racial separation in public schools prior to the adoption of the Amendment.[309] However, the leading supporter of ratification extolled in the broadest terms its equality provisions and indicated that the proponents expected it to compel in the other states the same equality in civil and political rights as existed in Maine, itself.[310]

Massachusetts too, had already made unlawful any racial segregation in schools prior to the submission of the Amendment.[311] Thus, since Massachusetts had already considered state required racial segregation completely inconsistent with a system of laws and government which treats all persons alike irrespective of color,[312] there was

The Committee on Education recommended passage of this act, saying: "The great events of the time are, also, all in favor of the elevation of the colored man. They are all tending to merge the distinctions of race and of class in the common brotherhood of humanity. They have already declared the Negro and the white man to be equal before the law; and the privileges here asked for by these petitioners, are simply a necessary result of this recognized equality." It went on to say, "We have no right to withhold it from him in any case", and asked, "With what consistency can we demand that these colored people shall be equal before the law in other states or the territories, while we, ourselves, deprive them of one of their most important civil rights?" no subsequent legislative action interpretative of the impact of the Amendment on segregation.

The deliberations of the legislature on the proposed Amendment opened with its reference to the body by the governor. He recommended ratification and his speech indicates that he understood Section 1 of the Amendment to be a reinforcement of the Civil Rights Act of 1866 and observed: "Whatever reasons existed at the time for the enactment of that bill, apply to the incorporation of its provisions into the state law." [313] Surprisingly, strong opposition to ratification developed. A majority of the joint committee recommended rejection on the ground that the proposed Amendment neither specifically guaranteed Negro suffrage nor added anything to what was already in the constitution "possibly excepting the last clause" of Section 1. Of this, is concluded: [314]

> "The denial by any state to any person within its jurisdiction, of the equal protection of the laws, would be a flagrant perversion of the guarantees of personal rights. . . . [But] such denial would be equally possible and probable hereafter, in spite of an indefinite reiteration of these guarantees by new amendments."

The minority reported that: [315]

> "Without entering into any argument upon the merits of the amendment, they would express the opinion that its ratification is extremely important in the present condition of national affairs."

When these reports were presented in the lower house of the legislature, a motion was passed to substitute the minority report.[316] Suffrage had claimed much of the strident debate on the motion. But a speech of one of the last members to speak for the motion was reported as follows:[317]

> "To the first article of this amendment, there had been no objection brought by those who favored rejection. . . . The speaker felt that this was a most important article; by it the question of equal rights was taken from the supreme courts of the States and given to the Supreme Court of the United States for decision; the adoption of the article was the greatest movement that the country had made toward centralization, and was a serious and most important step. This was taken solely for the reason of obtaining protection for the colored people of the South; the white men who do not need this article and do not like it, sacrifice some of their rights for the purpose of aiding the blacks."

The upper house considered the motion several days later, re-echoed the theme of the speeches previously made in the lower house, and voted for ratification.[318]

The New Hampshire legislature took up the proposed Amendment in June of 1866. The governor's message urged ratification but its brief comment was not revealing.[319] The majority report of the house committee with respect to the Amendment merely offered a resolution to modify.[320] But the minority reported a number of reasons for rejection which, inter alia, criticized section 1 on the grounds of ambiguity and furthermore:[321]

> "Because said amendment is a dangerous infringement upon the rights and independence of all the states, north as well as south, assuming as it does, control their legislation in matters purely local in their character, and impose disabilities upon them for regulating, in their own way [such matters]."

The same set of objections was presented by a minority of the special committee of the upper house.[322] Both chambers voted for ratification, however, within a month after the Amendment was offered to the state.[323]

Laws governing public schools in New Hampshire appear to have never been qualified on the basis of race or color at any time after its organic law obligated the legislature to stimulate public education.[324] Similarly, Vermont seems to have no history of segregated schools. Neither did its laws sanction such a policy.[325] When the legislature convened in 1866, the Governor's opening message discussed the proposed Fourteenth Amendment at some length. He urged that it be ratified to secure "equal rights and impartial liberty", otherwise a small number of whites in the South and the entire colored race would be left unprotected. In concluding, he said Vermont welcomed "such a reorganization of the rebellious communities, as would have given the people, white and black, the equal civil and political rights secured to the people of the State, by our Bill of Rights and Constitution, and under which peace,

The Middle Atlantic States.

Three Mid-Atlantic States, New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania ratified the Amendment. The Pennsylvania evidence is in some detail because it was one of the few states to preserve the full discussions and debates of its legislature. Furthermore, its statutes, previous to the adoption of the Amendment, authorized segregation in schools; [328] and public carriers had regulations which excluded or segregated Negroes. See West Chester & Phila. R. Co. v. Miles, 5 Smith (55 Pa.) 209 (1867).

On January 2, 1867, the Governor transmitted the Fourteenth Amendment to the Legislature. He called for its adoption primarily upon political grounds but strenuously urged that every citizen of the United States had certain rights that no state had a right to abridge and the proposed Amendment asserted "these vital principles in an authoritative manner, and this is done in the first clause of the proposed amendments [sic]." [329]

The resolution recommending ratification was introduced in the Pennsylvania Senate by its floor leader. He urged that one of the reasons why it had to be adopted was because Mississippi had enacted a law requiring segregation on railroads and the Amendment was necessary to overcome all state legislation of this character.[330] In summary of his concept of the purpose of section 1, he said:

> "The South must be fenced in by a system of positive, strong, just legislation. The lack of this has wrought her present ruin; her future renovation can come only through pure and equitable law; law restraining the vicious and protecting the innocent, making all castes and colors equal before its solemn bar, that, sir, is the sine qua non. . . ."

The pith of the speeches of both the proponents and opponents of ratification are as follows:

Senator Bingham, a leading supporter of the resolution, noted that "it has been only a question of time how soon all legal distinctions will be wiped out."[331]

Another announced, "I shall vote for it with satisfaction for my own conscience and gratitude to Congress for squarely meeting the universal demand of the loyal states to destroy all legal caste within our borders."[332]

The leading opponent of ratification interpreted the Amendment as follows:[333]

> "By the first section it is intended to destroy every distinction founded upon a difference in the caste, nationality, race or color of persons . . . which has found its way into the laws of the Federal or State Governments which regulate the civil relations or rights of the people. state and state authorities full security in the enjoyment of such advantages and securities." (Emphasis supplied).

The legislature ratified the Amendment on January 17, 1867.[334]

About two weeks later, on February 5th, a bill was introduced making it unlawful for public conveyances to exclude or segregate Negroes.[335] In introducing this bill, its sponsor announced that the doctrine of equality before the law required the passage of this bill. Both he and another supporter of the bill pointed out that these practices were pursuant to carrier regulations and policies and had to be eradicated by legislative action. It was also pointed out that the bill did not effect social equality because that is regulated solely by the personal tastes of each individual.[336] The bill was overwhelmingly enacted into law the following month.[337]

The school law authorizing separate schools was not specifically repealed until 1881 when the legislature made it unlawful for any school official to make any distinction on account of race or color in students attending or seeking to attend any public school.[338]

It appears, however, that when the state constitution was amended in 1873, the 1854 school law was viewed as having been brought into conformity with the adoption of a provision for a school system "wherein all children of this Commonwealth above the age of six years shall be educated. . . ."[339] The Secretary of State, official reporter of the Convention, states particular attention was paid to "that part which confers authority on the subject of education." And he noted that the new article was formulated to conform with the policy of protest against all racial discrimination and, specifically, to remove the "equivocal and indivious provision."[340] These purposes are further borne out when the sponsor of the 1881 bill stated:[341]

> "In proposing the repeal of the act of 1854, which in terms would be prohibited by the present State and Federal Constitutions, it seems a matter of surprise that an act so directly in conflict with the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments of the Constitution of the United States should have been permitted to have remained in the statute book until this time."

New Jersey, as early as 1844, enacted general legislation for the establishment and support of a public school system "for the equal benefit of all persons. . . ."[342] In 1850, special legislation was enacted which enabled Morris Township to establish a separate colored school district if the local town meeting voted to do so.[343] The state superintendent of schools construed this act and concluded that it in combination with the earlier law of 1844 permitted any local school system to maintain separate schools provided both schools offered the same advantages and no child was excluded.[344]

The New Jersey Legislature convened in a special session and hastily ratified the Amendment on September 11, 1866.[345] The dispatch with which this was done was made a focal issue in the following elections. The Republicans broadly defended the Amendment as "forbidding class legislation, or the subjecting of one class of people to burdens that are not equally laid upon all."[346] The Democrats more specifically contended that their candidates opposed the Amendment because they were "against Negro suffrage and the attempt to mix negroes with workingmen's children in public schools."[347] When the Republicans captured the governorship and elected a radical congressional delegation, the Democrats captured the state legislature and immediately proceeded to rescind New Jersey's ratification.[348]

When the Republicans recaptured control of the legislature in 1870 the school law was amended to require "a thorough and effective system of public schools for the instruction of all children. . . ."[349] And this was later reinforced by an enactment which made it unlawful to exclude any child from any public school on account of color.[350] As a result of this law, separate schools soon disappeared except in a few counties where Negro citizens generally accepted them. When Negroes chose not to accept these segregated schools the school authorities were required to admit them to the white schools pursuant to the prohibition of the 1881 school law.[351]

New York, like the other Middle-Atlantic states, had ante-bellum constitutions which merely authorized the legislature to establish a common school fund.[352] There was never any general legislation on the subject of racial separation in schools sharing in the common school fund. The legislature, however, granted charters to Brooklyn, Canandaigua, Buffalo and Albany which permitted these cities to maintain segregated schools as early as 1850.[353] The Common School Act of 1864 was in the same vein. It only permitted school boards in certain political subdivisions to establish and maintain segregated schools "when the inhabitants of any school district shall so determine, by resolution at any annual meeting called for that purpose, establish a separate school or separate schools for the instruction of such colored children. . . ."[354] Communities exercising the option under this law comprised the exception rather than the rule.[355]

Shortly after New York ratified the Amendment,[356] a constitutional convention was held and it adopted a new constitution which provided for free instruction of all persons of school age.[357] The convention approved a committee report which contained a ringing declaration that Negroes

Subsequently, in 1873, the legislature passed an "Act to Provide for the Protection of Citizens in Their Civil and Public Rights."[359] The Act made it unlawful for any person to exclude any other person on the ground of race or color from the equal enjoyment of any place of public accommodation, place of public amusement, public conveyance, "common schools and public instruction [sic] of learning. . . ." It also annulled the use of the word "white" or any other discriminatory term in all existing laws, statutes, ordinances and regulations.[360] The New York Court of Appeals did not give vitality to this act in the case of *People ex rel. Negroes the benefit of free schools.[361] Twenty years later, in 1847, this act was amended to permit the maintenance of separate schools for colored children if the residents of a school district objected to their admission into the white schools.[362] At its next session, the legislature repealed the provision in an earlier law that had prohibited the application of taxes paid by white residents toward the support of colored schools.[363] And in 1853 the school law was revised to require the allocation of public school funds in proportion to the number of children of school age regardless of color.[364]

Separate schools, however, were still maintained except in Cleveland, Oberlin and other northern cities despite the general feeling that this act had relaxed the stringent restrictions of the antecedent laws. Furthermore, the State Supreme Court held this law not to entitle colored children, as of right, to admission into white schools. Van Camp v. Board of Education, 9 Ohio St. 406 (1859).

After ratification of the Amendment,[365] the legislature did not immediately modify the schools laws. In fact, it did nothing until after the Ohio Supreme Court upheld compulsory segregated schools in State ex rel. Garnes v. McCann, 21 Ohio St. 198 (1872). Then the legislature enacted a statute which permitted rather than required segregated schools.[366] Later, it denied local school authorities the power to exercise their discretion in the premises.[367] By this act, all public schools were opened to all children without distinction on account of race or color. State v. Board of Education, 2 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 557 (1887).

Indiana's pre-Fourteenth Amendment school law provided for the support of public schools but exempted "all Negroes and mulattoes" from the assessment.[368] This law was interpreted as excluding colored children from public schools wherever the parents of white children objected. Lewis v. Henley, 2 Ind. 332 (1850).

On January 11, 1867, Governor Morton submitted the Fourteenth Amendment to the legislature. His message urged ratification but suggested that schools should be provided for Negroes and that they be educated in separate schools to relieve any friction which could arise if they were required to be admitted to white schools.[369] A resolution to ratify the Amendment was introduced on the same day and referred to a joint committee. Five days later the resolution was reported out favorably with a recommendation of prompt ratification.[370] A minority report was made which objected to the Amendment primarily because it conferred civil and political equality upon Negroes, including the same rights that were then enjoyed by the white race.[371]

The resolution was adopted on the same day in the Senate.[372] No speeches were made in support of the resolution in this chamber but two senators spoke at length against it.[373] In the House, the main contention of the opponents was that the Amendment would impose Negro equality,[374] seat Negroes on juries, grant them suffrage and admit them into the white schools.[375] The proponents only denied that the Amendment conferred suffrage.[376] And the lower chamber adopted the resolution on January 23, 1867.[377]

Two years after ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment, the legislature revised its law to require the organization of separate schools.[378] The act also authorized the maintenance of non-segregated schools in areas where there were insufficient Negro children residing within a reasonable distance to justify a separate school. In 1874, the compulsory segregation section of this law was declared valid in the case of Cory v. Carter, 48 Ind. 327 (1874).

The legislature, however, revised the school laws at its next session to permit (not require) segregated schools.[379] The revised law, furthermore, required that colored children be admitted to the regular schools if a separate school was not maintained. This provision was applied in sustaining mixed schools in State v. Grubbs, 85 Ind. 213 (1883).

Illinois statutes never specifically required separate schools. But the ante-bellum school statute provided that school districts with Negro populations should allow these residents a portion of the school fund equal to the amount of taxes collected from them.[380] As construed by the state superintendent of schools, this law was applied to require segregated schools.[381]

The Illinois legislature received the governor's message endorsing ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment on January 7, 1867. Both chambers then ratified it on the same day with virtually no discussion or debate.[382] About one year later, in December 1869, Illinois called a constitutional convention. It adopted the present organic law which provides for a free public school system for the education of "all children".[383] This provision stems from a resolution in which the convention directed the Education Committee to submit an article which would call for the establishment of a public school system for the education of every "susceptible child—without regard to color or previous condition".[384] Furthermore, the convention rejected two resolutions which would have directed the establishment of a compulsory segregated school system.[385]

Of all the states of the Western Reserve, Michigan was most deeply affected by the tide of abolitionism which swept this section during the pre-war years. By its Constitution of 1850 the word "white" was eliminated from the section establishing voting qualifications [386] and slavery was declared intolerable.[387] Neither this constitution nor the general law of the state recognized any racial distinctions in the enjoyment of public education. But as early as 1842 and as late as 1866, special statutes were passed granting school boards in certain of the larger cities discretionary power to regulate the apportionment of school funds and distribution of pupils among the several schools under their jurisdiction. Pursuant to this authority some school boards, e.g., in Detroit and Jackson, established separate schools.[388]

The Amendment was submitted to the legislature on January 6, 1867. On January 12th, a resolution was adopted in the Senate instructing the Committee on Public Instruction to report out a bill "to prevent the exclusion of children from the primary or graded or other public schools of this state on account of race or color." And four days later the general school law was amended to provide that "all residents of any district shall have an equal right to attend any school therein. . . ." [389] The Fourteenth Amendment was subsequently ratified on February 16, 1867.[390]

The legislative record of Michigan during the next several years is replete with more blows against segregation and other distinctions based on race or color. In 1869, insurance companies were prohibited from making any distinction between white and Negro insureds.[391] The ban against interracial marriages was removed in 1883.[392] Then in 1885, the civil rights law was enacted prohibiting racial separation on public conveyances, in places of public accommodation, recreation, and amusement.[393]

Wisconsin, since 1848, provided for a public school system free to all children.[394] Moreover, during the crucial years, its Negro population was insignificant—less than two-tenths of one percent,[395] Thus, it seems obvious why segregation in schools or elsewhere never merited the attention of the legislature at the time of its ratification of the Amendment or thereafter.[396]

The Wisconsin legislature met on January 3, 1867 and was addressed by the Governor. His speech suggests that in his thinking the Fourteenth Amendment which he asked them to ratify was designed to apply solely to the South and required that "they must assent to the proposed amendment with all of its guarantees, securing to all men equality before the law. . . ." [397] A joint resolution was introduced to ratify the Amendment and referred to a committee of three, two of whom reported a recommendation to adopt. The report filed by the minority member condemned the Amendment at some length. "The apparent object," to him, was to allow Congress to enfranchise Negroes, legislate generally on civil rights, "give to the federal government the supervision of all the social and domestic relations of the citizen of the state and to subordinate state governments to federal power." It appears that this understanding of the Amendment was not disputed. Rather, one supporter of the Amendment is reported as stating: "If the states refuse to legislate as to give all men equal civil rights and equal protection before the laws, then, sir, there should be supervisory power to make them do that, and a consolidation of that kind will be a benefit instead of an injury.[399] And, another answered:[400]

> "We therefore need such a provision in the Constitution so that if the South discriminates against the blacks the United States courts can protect them. I know it is objected that this is an enlargement of the power of the United States Supreme Court. But it is a power given on the side of liberty—power to protect and not power to oppress. For the appeal will come up to this court from the aggrieved individual against the aggressing state. . . ."

The Western States.

Of the states west of the Mississippi which ratified the Amendment, Nebraska is quite significant because it was admitted to the Union during the life of the 39th Congress and conditions were imposed upon its admission which demonstrate that the Congress which prepared the Amendment intended to eradicate all distinctions based upon race. Nebraska won statehood without having ratified the Amendment. But the enabling Act provided that "this act shall take effect with the fundamental and perpetual condition that there shall be no abridgement or denial of the exercise of the elective franchise, or any other right, to any person by reason of race or color. . . ." Act of February 9, 1867, ch. 9, sec. 3, 14 Stat. 377 (emphasis supplied). The Act, furthermore, required Nebraska to publicly proclaim this fundamental condition "as a part of the organization of this state."

While the enabling Act was still being considered by Congress, the territorial legislature forthwith passed a "Bill to remove all distinctions on account of race or color in our public schools" [401] since the existing school law restricting the enumeration of pupils to white youths [402] had heretofore been administratively construed to exclude colored children from the public schools. This bill failed to enter the statute books for lack of gubernatorial endorsement.[403]

The same session of the legislature by an appropriate resolution recognized the enabling Act's "fundamental condition" on February 20, 1867 and on March 1st Nebraska was proclaimed the 37th state. Two months later, a special session of the legislature was called to ratify the Amendment and to enact legislation to "render Nebraska second to no other state in the facilities offered to all her children, irrespective of sex or condition. . . ." [404] The Amendment was ratified in June 1867,[405] and the school law was amended to require the enumeration of "all the children" in the school census.[406] The new school law did not in specific language prohibit segregation, but colored children entered the public schools on a non-segregated basis at the next school term in September, 1867.[407]

Another school law was enacted in 1869 which provided an increase in the taxes for the support of public schools

Prior to its ratification of the Amendment, Kansas, a loyal border state, had adopted a policy of permissive segregation whereby boards of education were authorized, but not required, to establish separate schools.[409] The legislature ratified the Amendment on January 16, 1867,[410] and changed the school law on February 26th by an act which made it illegal for "any" school board to refuse to admit "any" child.[411] In 1868, it reenacted the earlier permissive school segregation law.[412] Subsequently, an 1876 revision of the school laws omitted any authorization for segregation in cities of the first class and specifically forbade segregated schools in cities of the second class.[413] The same session also passed a civil rights act which is still the law and proscribes any distinction on account of race or color in "any state university, college, or other school of public instruction" or in any licensed place of public accommodation or amusement, or on any means of public carriage.[414] In 1879, the legislature reenacted the law permitting racial

Minnesota ratified the Fourteenth Amendment on January 16, 1867.[416] Its legislature was not obliged to contemplate whether the Amendment nullified segregated schools because such practices had been made a penal offense in 1864.[417] However, in submitting the Amendment to the legislature, the governor urged that its adoption was necessary because of the failure of the former seceding states "to reorganize their civil government on the basis of equal . . . rights, without distinction of color. . . ."[418] In 1873, the legislature rephrased the school law so as to specifically prohibit segregated schools.[419]

In Nevada, the school law in existence prior to its consideration of the Amendment excluded Negroes from public schools and prescribed a penalty against any school which opened its doors to such persons.[420] However, the statute provided that school authorities might, if they deemed it advisable, establish a separate school for colored children and maintain it out of the general school fund. There is no subsequent reference to the subject of separate schools in the statute books and the segregatory statute itself was dropped from subsequent compilations of laws.[422]

The Oregon evidence is singularly meager. There were no laws requiring or permitting racial separation in schools either prior or subsequent to ratification of the Amendment on September 9, 1866. What the ratifying legislature understood as to the force of the Amendment and the significance of the abortive attempt to withdraw its ratification in 1868 on this subject is unavailable from the bare notations contained in the legislative journals.[423] The contemporary newspapers are also barren of information on this point.[424] What evidence there is, indicates that separate schools did exist at least in Portland as late as 1867 and that they were discontinued in 1871.[425]

thorized racial separation in schools at that time.[427] Instances of exclusion and segregation were being quickly remedied without recourse to the courts.[428] Where the courts were called upon, local practices of segregation in schools were never sustained as lawful. Clark v. School Directors, 24 Iowa 266 (1868); Smith v. Directors of Independent Schools Dist., 40 Iowa 518 (1875); Dove v. Independent School Dist., 41 Iowa 689 (1875). In sum, the legislatures in all of the Union States which ratified the Fourteenth Amendment, except three, understood and contemplated that the Amendment proscribed State laws compelling segregation in public schools.

C. The Non-Ratifying States Understood that the Fourteenth Amendment Forbade Enforced Segregation in Public Schools.

Four states did not ratify the Amendment, three specifically withholding endorsement and the other being unable to arrive at any definitive position. Delaware, in the anomalous position of a former slave state which sided with the Union, rejected it on February 7, 1867 with a resolution which declared that "this General Assembly believes the adoption of the said proposed amendment to the Constitution would have a tendency to destroy the rights of the States in their Sovereign capacity as states, would be an attempt to establish an equality not sanctioned by the laws

Then, shortly thereafter, the General Assembly in a series of discriminatory statutes demonstrated that it fully understood that equality before the law demanded non-segregation. It passed laws permitting segregation in schools,[431] places of public accommodation, places of public amusement and on public carriers.[432] Delaware, however, deferred sanctioning compulsory racial separation in public schools until after this Court handed down the Plessy decision.[433]

Maryland.

Maryland was also a loyal former slave-holding state. It rejected the Amendment on March 23, 1867.[434] The establishment of universal free public education here coincided with the Reconstruction Period. Although Maryland has always maintained a dual school system, it has never enacted a law specifically forbidding racial integration in its public schools. Rather, separate and parallel provisions were made for the education of white and colored children.[435]

Kentucky.

The third of the states which rejected the Amendment was Kentucky, a state with a slaveholding background and generally sympathetic with the South with regard to the status of Negroes although it did not secede. It was the first to refuse ratification: its rejection was enrolled on January 10, 1867.[436] While Negroes were denied or severely limited in the enjoyment of many citizenship rights at that time, including exclusion from juries,[437] the legislature was silent on the specific question of compulsory segregated schools.[438] Like its Maryland brothers, it passed two discrete series of laws, one for the benefit of white children and the other for colored children. But no definite compulsory education statute was enacted until 1904[439] although the constitution had been previously amended so as to support such legislation.[440]

California.

California was the only state whose legislature considered the Amendment and yet did not reach an official stand on the matter.[441] Before the Fourteenth Amendment was proclaimed the law of the land, the legislature in 1866, relaxed the pattern of compulsory segregation when the school law was revised to permit Negro children to enter "white" schools, provided a majority of the white parents did not object.[442] This provision survived changes made in the school laws in 1870 and 1872; and, in 1874, a bill to eliminate segregated schools led to the adoption of a law which required the admission of colored children "into schools for white children" if separate schools were not provided.[443] Later in this same year the state supreme court upheld segregated schools despite the petitioner's claim that this practice violated the Amendment. Ward v. Flood, 48 Cal. 36 (1874). The legislature then revised the school laws and eliminated the provisions which had been held to require separate schools for Negro children.[444]

Debates of the California Constitutional Convention of 1873, pp. 631, 642, 649 (1880).

The evidence from the non-ratifying states also indicates that their legislatures understood or contemplated that the Fourteenth Amendment forbade legislation which enforced the separation of white and colored children in public schools.

CONCLUSIONS OF PART II

There is, therefore, considerable evidence and, we submit, conclusive evidence that the Congress which submitted and the state legislatures and conventions which considered the Fourteenth Amendment contemplated and understood that it would proscribe all racial distinctions in law including segregation in public schools. A part of this evidence consists of the political, social and legal theories which formed the background of the men who framed the Fourteenth Amendment and the Radical Republican majority in Congress at that time.

Congressional debates following the Civil War must be read and understood in the light of the equalitarian principles of absolute and complete equality for all Americans as exemplified throughout the Abolitionist movement prior to the Civil War.

Many of the members of Congress, in debating the bill which became the Civil Rights Act of 1875, made it clear in no uncertain terms that it was generally understood in the 39th Congress that the Fourteenth Amendment was intended to prohibit all racial distinctions, including segregation in public school systems.

Running throughout the 39th Congress was a determination of the Radical Republican majority to transform these equalitarian principles into federal statutory and constitutional law. They realized that these high principles could not be achieved without effective federal legislation. The infamous Black Codes were demonstrative proof that the southern states were determined to prevent the newly freed Negroes from escaping from an inferior status even after the Thirteenth Amendment. The Radical Republican majority realized that in the status of American law at that time, the only way to achieve fulfillment of their determination to remove caste and racial distinctions from our law would be for them to effect a revolutionary change in the federal-state relationship.

After many drafting experiments, the Committee of Fifteen introduced in Congress the proposed amendment to the Constitution which was to become the Fourteenth Amendment. The broad and comprehensive scope of the bill was clearly set forth by Senator Howard, Chairman of the Judiciary Committee. An appraisal of the Congressional debates during the period the Fourteenth Amendment was being considered show conclusively that in so far as section 1 was concerned, there could be no doubt that it was intended to not only destroy the validity of the existing Black Codes, but also to deprive the states of power to enact any future legislation which would be based upon class or caste distinctions. It is likewise clear that the Fourteenth Amendment was intended to be even more comprehensive than the scope of the original bill which, subsequently weakened by amendment, became the Civil Rights Act of 1866.

Throughout the debates in the 39th Congress and subsequent Congresses, the framers of the Amendment, the Radical Republican majority in Congress, over and over again, made it clear that: (1) future Congresses might in the exercise of their power under section 5 take whatever action they might deem necessary to enforce the Amendment; (2) that one of the purposes of the Amendment was to take away from future Congresses the power to diminish the rights intended to be protected by the Amendment; and (3) they at all times made it clear that the Amendment was meant to be self-executing and that the judiciary would have the authority to enforce the provisions of the Amendment without further implementation by Congress. All of the decisions of this Court, without exception, have recognized this principle.

Other Congressional debates, including those on the readmission of certain states, the amnesty bills and other legislation give further evidence of the intent of Congress in regard to the broad scope of the Fourteenth Amendment. The debates in Congress on legislation which was later to become the Civil Rights Act of 1875 made it clear that efforts of states to set up segregated school systems violated the Fourteenth Amendment. These debates were more specific on the question of segregation in public education because some states were already beginning to violate the Fourteenth Amendment by setting up segregated systems.

A study of the statements and actions of those responsible for state ratification of the Amendment remove any doubt as to their understanding that the Fourteenth Amendment was intended to prohibit state imposed racial segregation in public schools.

After addressing ourselves to questions 1 and 2 propounded by this Court, we find that the evidence not only supports but also compels the conclusions reached in Part One hereof. Wherefore, we respectfully submit, this Court should decide that the constitutional provisions and statutes involved in these cases are in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment and therefore unconstitutional.

PART THREE

This portion is directed to questions four and five of the Court's Order:

4. Assuming it is decided that segregation in public schools violates the Fourteenth Amendment,

(a) would a decree necessarily follow providing that, within the limits set by normal geographic school districting, Negro children should forthwith be admitted to schools of their choice, or

(b) may this Court, in the exercise of its equity powers, permit an effective gradual adjustment to be brought about from existing segregated systems to a system not based on color distinctions?

5. On the assumption on which questions 4(a) and (b) are based, and assuming further that this Court will exercise its equity powers to the end described in question 4(b),

(a) should this Court formulate detailed decrees in these cases;

(b) if so what specific issues should the decrees reach;

(c) should this Court appoint a special master to hear evidence with a view to recommending specific terms for such decrees;

(d) should this Court remand to the courts of first instance with directions to frame decrees in these cases, and if so, what general directions should the decrees of this Court include and what procedures should the courts of first instance follow in arriving at the specific terms of more detailed decrees?

I.

This Court should declare invalid the constitutional and statutory provisions here involved requiring segregation in public schools. After careful consideration of all of the factors involved in transition from segregated school systems to unsegregated school systems, appellants know of no reasons or considerations which would warrant postponement of the enforcement of appellants' rights by this Court in the exercise of its equity powers.

The questions raised involve consideration of the propriety of postponing relief in these cases, should the Court declare segregation in public schools impermissible under the Constitution. The basic difficulty presented is in the correlation between a grant of effective relief and temporary postponement. After carefully addressing ourselves to the problem, we find that difficulty insurmountable.

A. The Fourteenth Amendment requires that a decree be entered directing that appellants be admitted forthwith to public schools without distinction as to race or color.

"It is fundamental that these cases concern rights which are personal and present". Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629, 635; see also Sipuel v. Board of Regents, 332 U. S. 631, 633. These rights are personal because each appellant [445] is asserting his individual constitutional right to grow up in our democratic society without the impress of state-imposed racial segregation in the public schools. They are present because they will be irretrievably lost if their enjoyment is put off. The rights of the adult students in the Sipuel, Sweatt, and McLaurin cases required, this Court held, vindication forthwith. A fortiori, this is true of the rights of [445] As used herein "appellant" includes the respondents in No. 10.

BLEED THROUGH

children to a public education that they must obtain, if at all while they are children. It follows that appellants are entitled to be admitted forthwith to public schools without distinction as to race and color.

B. There is no equitable justification for postponement of appellants' enjoyment of their rights.

Even if the Court should decide that enforcement of individual and personal constitutional rights may be postponed, consideration of the relevant factors discloses no equitable basis for delaying enforcement of appellants' rights.

Appellants have no desire to set precise bounds to the reserve discretion of equity. They concede that, as a court of chancery, this Court has power in a proper case to mold its relief to individual circumstances in ways and to an extent which it is now unnecessary to define with entire precision. But the rights established by these appellants are far outside the classes as to which, whether for denial or delay, a "balance of convenience" has been or ought to be struck.

These infant appellants are asserting the most important secular claims that can be put forward by children, the claim to their full measure of the chance to learn and grow, and the inseparably connected but even more important claim to be treated as entire citizens of the society into which they have been born. We have discovered no case in which such rights, once established, have been postponed by a cautious calculation of conveniences. The nuisance cases, the sewage cases, the cases of the overhanging cornices, need not be distinguished. They distinguish themselves.

The Fourteenth Amendment can hardly have been intended for enforcement at a pace geared down to the mores of the very states whose action it was designed to limit. The balance between the customs of the states and the personal rights of these appellants has been struck by that Amendment. "[A] court of equity is not justified in ignoring that pronouncement under the guise of exercising equitable jurisdiction." Youngstown Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U. S. 579, 610 (concurring opinion).

Affirming the decree of one of the few judges still carrying the traditional title and power of Chancellor, the highest Court of Delaware epitomized equity in one of the cases now before this bar when it declared in Gebhart v. Belton, 91 A. 2d 137, 149 that > "To require the plaintiffs to wait another year under present conditions would be in effect partially to deny them that to which we have held they are entitled."

Appellants, in the main, are obliged to speculate as to factors which might be urged to justify postponement of the enforcement of their rights. Hitherto, appellees have offered no justification for any such postponement. Instead they have sought to maintain a position which is, essentially, that a state may continue governmentally enforced racism so long as the state government wills it.

In deciding whether sufficient reason exists for postponing the enjoyment of appellants' rights, this Court is not resolving an issue which depends upon a mere preponderance of the evidence. It needs no citation of authority to establish that the defendant in equity who asks the chancellor to go slow in upholding the vital rights of children accruing to them under the Constitution, must make out an affirmative case of crushing conviction to sustain his plea for delay.

The problem of effective gradual adjustment cannot fairly arise in three of the five cases consolidated for argument. In the Kansas case, there was a frank concession on oral argument that elimination of segregation would not have serious consequences. In Delaware, court-compelled desegregation in this very case has already been accomplished. The case from the District of Columbia is here on a dismissal of the complaint on motion. In the oral argument the counsel for respondents implied that he foresaw no difficulties in enforcing a decree which would abolish segregation. Surely it would be curious as well as a gratuitous assumption that such a change cannot be expeditiously handled in this nation's capital. Cf. District of Columbia v. John R. Thompson Co., 346 U. S. 100.

We can, however, put out of the case what is not in dispute. We concede that there may well be delays of a purely administrative nature involved in bringing about desegregation. Any injunction requires time for compliance and we do not ask the impossible. We strongly urge, however, that no reason has been suggested and none has been discovered by us that would warrant denying appellants their full rights beyond the beginning of the next school year.

But we do not understand that the "effective gradual adjustment" mentioned in this Court's fourth and fifth questions referred to such conceded necessities. We proceed then, to consider possible grounds that might be put forth as reasons for added delay, or for the postponement of relief to appellants.

It has been suggested that desegregation may bring about unemployment for Negro teachers. (Appellees' Brief in Davis v. County School Board, p. 31; Transcript of Argument in the same case, p. 71) If this is more than a remote possibility, it undoubtedly can be offset by good faith efforts on the part of the responsible school boards.[446] On the other hand, if appellees' suggestion is based upon an unexpressed intention of discriminating against Negro teachers by wholesale firings, it is not even worthy of notice in a court of equity.

[446] In view of the nationwide shortage of teachers, it is doubtful that any unemployment would be more than transitory. See e.g., New York Times, August 19, 1953, 31:8 (S. M. Bouthardt puts elementary teachers shortage at 116,000; August 24, 1953, 21:1 (Comm. Thurston and NEA on shortage); 22 J. Neg. Ed. 95 (1953).

It has been bruited about that certain of the states involved in this litigation will cease to support and perhaps even abolish their public school systems, if segregation is outlawed. (Davis v. County School Board, Transcript of Argument, pp. 69-70; Gebhart v. Belton, Transcript of Argument, p. 17; Briggs v. Eliott, Record on Appeal, p. 113.) We submit that such action is not permissible. Cf. Rice v. Elmore, 165 F. 2d 387 (CA 4th 1947), cert. denied, 333 U. S. 875. Any such reckless threats cannot be relevant to a consideration of effective "gradual adjustment"; they are based upon opposition to desegregation in any way, at any time.

Finally, there are hints and forebodings of trouble to come, ranging from hostility and deteriorated relations to actual violence. (Appellees' brief in Briggs v. Eliott, p. 267; Appellees' brief in Davis v. County School Board, p. 17) Obviously this Court will not be deterred by threats of unlawful action. Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U. S. 60, 81.

Moreover, there are powerful reasons to confirm the belief that immediate desegregation will not have the untoward consequences anticipated. The states in question are inhabited in the main by law-abiding people who up to now have relied upon what they believe—erroneously, as we have demonstrated—to be the law. It cannot be presumed that they will not obey the law as expounded by this Court. Such evidence as there is lends no support to defendants' forebodings. Note, Grade School Segregation: The Latest Attack on Racial Discrimination, 61 Yale L. J. 730, 739, 743 (1952).

A higher public interest than any yet urged by appellees is the need for the enforcement of constitutional rights fought for and won about a century ago. Public interest requires that racial distinctions proscribed by our Constitution be given the fullest protection. Survival of our country in the present international situation is inevitably tied to resolution of this domestic issue.

BLEED THROUGH

The greatest strength of our democracy grows out of its people working together as equals. Our public schools are "[d]esigned to serve as perhaps the most powerful agency for promoting cohesion among a heterogeneous democratic people...." Mr. Justice Frankfurter, concurring in Illinois ex rel. McCollum v. Board of Education, 333 U. S. 206, 216-217.

C. Appellants are unable, in good faith, to suggest terms for a decree which will secure effective gradual adjustment because no such decree will protect appellants' rights.

Question 5 assumes that the Court, having decided that segregation in public schools violates the Fourteenth Amendment, will, nevertheless, in the exercise of its equity powers, permit an effective gradual adjustment from segregated schools to systems not operated on the basis of color distinctions. This necessarily assumes further that reasons might be produced to justify consideration of postponement of the enforcement of the present and personal rights here involved. As we have pointed out immediately hereinbefore we are unable to identify any such reason.

Appellants obviously are aware of the existence of segregated school systems throughout the South similar to those presently before this Court. Similarly, appellants realize that the thrust of decisions in these cases may appear to present complex problems of adjustment because segregated schools have existed for nearly a century in many areas of this country. Generalizations, however, as to the scope and character of the complexities which might arise from immediate enforcement of appellants' rights would be unwarranted. This is demonstrated in part by the fact that even in the five cases joined for hearing, there appears to be no uniformity in the extent of the task of adjustment from segregated to non-segregated schools.

Necessarily, consideration of the specific issues which decrees should reach on the basis of the assumptions of Question 5 likewise requires the assumption that reasons will be adduced to warrant consideration of postponement of enforcement of appellants' rights.[447]

Though no cogent reasons were offered to support them, two suggestions of methods of postponement of relief to appellants were made to this Court in the original brief for the United States. The first of these was "integration on a grade basis," i.e., to integrate the first grades immediately, and to continue such integration until completed as to all grades in the elementary schools (Brief, pp. 30-31). The second was integration "on a school-by school" basis (Brief, p. 31).

The first suggestion is intolerable. It would mean the flat denial of the right of every appellant in these cases. The second plan is likewise impossible to defend because it would mean the deliberate denial of the rights of many of the plaintiffs. If desegregation is possible in some schools in a district, why not in all? Must some appellants' rights be denied altogether so that others may be more conveniently protected?

[447] It follows that there is no need for this Court to appoint a Master. Since repeal in 1948 of the 1805 statute, 28 U. S. C., § 863 (1946), forbidding the introduction of new evidence at an appellate level, there would appear to be no reason why such master could not be appointed. Certainly respected authorities have recommended the practice of appellate courts' taking evidence. See 1 WIGMORE, EVIDENCE 41 (3d ed., 1940); POUND, APPELLATE PROCEDURE IN CIVIL CASES pp. 303, 387 (1941); Note, 56 HARV. L. REV. 1313 (1943), and in other times and jurisdictions it has been respected practice. See SMITH, APPEALS OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL FROM AMERICAN PLANTATIONS 310 (1950); Rules of the Supreme Court of Judicature, Order 58, Rules 1, 2; cf. New Mexico, Stat. 1949, c. 168, § 19. However, taking of evidence by a Master is undoubtedly a departure from normal practice on appeal and it may result in loss of time to the prejudice of plaintiffs' rights.

Whether any given plan for gradual adjustment would be effective would depend on the showing of reasons valid in equity for postponement of enforcement of appellants' rights. In accordance with instructions of this Court we have addressed ourselves to all of the plans for gradual adjustment which we have been able to find. None would be effective. We recognize that the appellees, as school officials and state officers, might offer reasons for seeking postponement of the effect of decrees in these cases. Therefore, we submit, affirmative answers to questions 4(b) and 5 can come only from appellees since they alone can adduce reasons for postponement of enforcement of appellants' rights.

In the absence of any such reasons the only specific issue which appellants can recommend to the Court that the decrees should reach is the substantive one presented here, namely, that appellees should be required in the future to discharge their obligations as state officers without drawing distinctions based on race and color. Once this is done not only the local communities involved in these several cases, but communities throughout the South, would be left free to work out individual plans for conforming to the then established precedent free from the statutory requirement of rigid racial segregation.

In the very nature of the judicial process once a right is judicially declared proposals for postponement of the remedy must originate with the party desiring that postponement.

We submit that it would be customary procedure for the appellees to first produce whatever reasons they might urge to justify postponement of relief. Appellants then would be in a position to advise the Court of their views with respect to the matter.

Conclusion

Under the applicable decisions of this Court the state constitutional and statutory provisions herein involved are clearly unconstitutional. Moreover, the historical evidence surrounding the adoption, submission and ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment compels the conclusion that it was the intent, understanding and contemplation that the Amendment proscribed all state imposed racial restrictions. The Negro children in these cases are arbitrarily excluded from state public schools set apart for the dominant white groups. Such a pratice can only be continued on a theory that Negroes, qua Negroes, are inferior to all other Americans. The constitutional and statutory provisions herein challenged cannot be upheld without a clear determination that Negroes are inferior and, therefore, must be segregated from other human beings. Certainly, such a ruling would destroy the intent and purpose of the Fourteenth Amendment and the very equalitarian basis of our Government.

WHEREFORE, it is respectfully submitted that the judgments in cases No. 1, 2 and 4 should be reversed and the judgment in No. 10 should be affirmed on the grounds that the constitutional and statutory provisions involved in each of the cases violate the Fourteenth Amendment.

SUPPLEMENT

An Analysis of the Political, Social, and Legal Theories Underlying the Fourteenth Amendment

The first Section of the Fourteenth Amendment did not spring full blown from the brow of any individual proponent. Primitive natural rights theories and earlier constitutional forms were the origins of its equal protection-due process-privileges and immunities trilogy. The occasion for the metamorphosis of moral premises to full-fledged constitutional status was the attack on the American system of slavery. During the long antislavery crusade, the trilogy became a form of shorthand for, and the spearhead of, the whole of the argument against distinctions and caste based on race.

Section One of the Fourteenth Amendment thus marks the "constitutionalization" of an ethico-moral argument. The really decisive shifts occurred before the Civil War, and the synthesis was made, not by lawyers or judges, but by laymen. Doctrines originally worked out and propagated by a dissident minority became, by 1866, the dominant constitutional theory of the country.

In both language and form, Section One was the distillation of basic constitutional and legal theories long understood and voiced by leaders in a Congress upon which history had cast both the opportunity and the obligation to amend the Constitution to regulate relationships profoundly altered by the abolition of slavery.[1] None can doubt that the thrust of the Amendment was equalitarian and that it was adopted to wipe out the racial inequalities that were the legacies of that system. But beyond this, the majestic generalities of the Section can be seen to have evolved naturally and logically in the minds of the anti-slavery generation.[2]

At the outset we point out that we do not set forth the arguments of pamphleteers, or even of lawyers or congressmen, to justify the validity of their constitutional theories. We do not say that these theories were universally held, or deny that they were vigorously challenged. Nor do we urge that the pre-Civil War Constitution contained the sweeping guarantees that the Abolitionists claimed for Negroes. These are beside our present point. What we do undertake in this section is illumination of the constitutional language—the moral and ethical opinions that were the matrix of the Amendment, the development under terriffic counter-pressures of the principal texts and forms, the meaning of "equal protection" and "due process" as understood and contemplated by those who wrote those phrases into the Amendment.

1. The Declaration of The "Self-Evident Truths"

The roots of our American equalitarian ideal extend deep into the history of the western world. Philosophers of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries produced an intellectual climate in which the equality of man was a central concept. Their beliefs rested upon the basic proposition that all men were endowed with certain natural rights, some of which were surrendered under the so-called "social contract." The state, in return, guaranteed individual rights, and owed protection equally to all men. Thus, governments existed, not to give, but to protect rights; and allegiance and protection were reciprocal. For his allegiance, the citizen was guaranteed his rights and the equal protection of the law.[3]

This doctrine was the core of the first great statement of American principles. To Jefferson and the other draftsmen of the Declaration of Independence, it was "self-evident" that "all men are created equal," and "are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights," among which are "Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness," and that "to secure these rights, Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."[4]

[4] It is interesting to note in this context that Jefferson's original draft of the Declaration, accepted by Franklin and Adams, the other members of the sub-committee responsible for the drafting, contained severe strictures on the King because of the slave trade. See BECKER, op. cit. supra note 3, at 212-213.

Abhorrence of arbitrariness—the central element of due process—and the ideal of a general and equal law—the core of equal protection—both were implicit in the Lockean-Jeffersonian premises. Slavery—with its theories of racial damnation, racial inferiority, and racial discrimination—was inherently repugnant to the American creed and the Christian ethic. This fact was being rapidly and increasingly sensed. As men sensed it, they had to fit it into the only political theory they knew: Governments existed, not to give, but to protect human rights; allegiance and protection were reciprocal—i.e., ought to be reciprocal; rights and duties were correlative—i.e., had to be correlative if Americans ever were to live with their consciences and to justify their declared political faith.

Long before the Revolution, Quakers and Puritans attacked slavery as a violation of the social compact and Christian ethic.[5] After 1776, Jefferson's "self-evident truths" put a cutting edge on all such pleas—made them the broadswords in every attack. Idealists demanded that America live up to her Declaration. "All men" must mean all men. "Unalienable Rights . . . of Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness" must be given its full human, not merely a restricted racial, application. Race and color were arbitrary, insubstantial bases for accord or denial of natural, human rights. Sensitive leaders soon found themselves confronted with what Gunnar Myrdal

After the Revolution, the "self-evident truths" and the provisions of the state Bills of Rights were employed as weapons against slavery and against racial distinctions.[7] Down through the Civil War, moreover, the "self-evident truths" constituted precisely what Jefferson declared them to be—political axioms—except in the South after the invention of the cotton gin.[8] They were on every tongue as rhetorical shorthand, and were popularly regarded as the marrow of the Constitution itself. [8] While early southern leaders in Virginia accepted Jeffersonian concepts of natural rights, contract, and equality, later leaders and theorists defended the slave society on the basis of Greek concepts. Man had no rights save those created by the state. Men were inherently unequal, and the end of the state was not equality but justice. Each man would have status in accordance with his ability. Such theorists posited the inherent inferiority of the Negro. Their theory was broad enough to justify slavery for any man, irrespective of race or color. revolution, Jefferson no less than Locke had laid the groundwork for another. The dominating premise that governments were instituted for protection and that they derived their just powers from the consent of the governed had begun to make slavery, and with it race distinctions, untenable. What slowly took shape was an ethical interpretation of American origins and destiny.

2. The Moral Suasion Campaign and Its Rejection

The Age of Enlightenment of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries gave birth to a world-wide antislavery movement. A wave of humanitarianism, embracing quests for abolition of slavery, suffrage for women, and penal, land, and other reforms, swept across the United States of the early nineteenth century. Because of its dramatic qualities, the American antislavery movement assumed even larger proportions and eventually overshadowed the other phases.[9] Like them, it was based fundamentally on Judeo-Christian ethic and was formulated in terms of equalitarianism and natural rights.

The early antislavery movement was a campaign of moral suasion. Rational men appealed to other rational men to square precept with practice. Proponents of equality, who were by that definition opponents of slavery, sought to persuade slaveholders of the error of enslaving other men, i.e., of denying equality to those held as slaves. That campaign bore early fruit in Virginia, in the uplands of the Carolinas, and even in the deeper South. The appeal to the South ultimately broke on the hard rock of economic self-interest after invention of the cotton gin. Geography and migrations tended further to sectionalize the institution. Quakers and Scotch-Irish yeomen from Virginia and the Carolinas, unable to arrest spread of a labor system they detested, and others from the deeper South, fled en masse, settling generally in Ohio and Indiana. There they were joined by staunch Puritan and Calvinist stocks from New York and New England. Thus, the antislavery movement became sectionalized with important centers in Ohio, western New York, and Pennsylvania.

Spearheading the movement was the American Anti-Slavery Society, founded in 1833 and headed by the wealthy Tappan brothers. Recruited and led by Theodore Weld,[10] a brilliant orator and organizer, and by his co-leader, James G. Birney,[11] a converted Alabama slaveholder and lawyer, whole communities were abolitionized in the years 1835-1837. Appeals were aimed at influential leaders; lawyers in particular were sought out and recruited by the score.

This appeal was an ethico-moral-religious-natural rights argument. It was addressed by the revivalists to their countrymen as patriots, Christians, and "free moral agents." "The law of nature clearly teaches the natural republican equality of all mankind. Nature revolts at human slavery. . . . The Law of God renders all Natural Rights inalienable. . . . Weld was a tireless speaker and pamphleteer who turned out documents that became guide posts in the antislavery movement: SLAVERY AS IT IS (1839); THE POWER OF CONGRESS OVER THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA (1838); THE BIBLE AGAINST SLAVERY (1837). Such persons as William Jay, John Quincy Adams and Senator Robert C. Winthrop relied on Weld for legal research. See 2 WELD-GRIMKE LETTERS 748, 956-958. The evangelical character of the antislavery movement helps account for the flood of arguments that poured from it. It was even organized on an analogy drawn from early Christian evangelists with its Seventy and its Council of Twelve.

lished, not to give, but to protect . . . rights."[12] Negroes, they continued, were "not naturally inferior." They simply had been degraded by slavery. They were persons, endowed by God with all the attributes of personality. Their enslavement could no more be justified than could chattelization of men with red hair. Slavery rested on a capricious, discredited classification.[13] It simply was institutionalized false imprisonment. White men were protected against enslavement and against false imprisonment. "What abolitionists demand as naked justice is that the benefit and protection of these just laws be extended to all human being alike . . . without regard to color or any other physical peculiarities."[14]

Racial discrimination, in short, was repugnant both as a breach of equality and as a breach of protection. Because it was a breach of protection, it also was a breach of equality; and because it was a breach of equality, it was thereby an even greater breach of protection. This was the outcome of Americans' triple-barreled major premise which posited the purpose of all government to be the protection of inalienable rights bestowed upon all men by their Creator. Once that compound premise was granted—and in the generations since 1776 virtually all Americans [13] The idea that race and color were arbitrary, capricious standards on which to base denial of human rights was implicit in all anti-slavery attacks on discrimination and prejudice. Yet it was when the constitutional-legal attack began to reinforce the religious one that such arguments became explicit, and the concept of an arbitrary classification developed. Lawyers like Ellsworth, Goddard, Birney (Philanthropist, Dec. 9, 1836, p. 3, cols. 4-5), Gerrit Smith (see AMERICAN ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY, 3 ANNUAL REPORTS 16-17 (1836)) and Salmon P. outside the South had spoken as if they granted it—the abolitionists' conclusions were unassailable. The heart of it was that these basic ideals of liberty, equality, and protection were deemed to be paramount by reason of their place in the Declaration and determinative by reason of the place of the Declaration in American life and history.

The issue had to be resolved within the framework of the constitutional system. Appeals to ethico-moral concepts and to natural rights were good enough to argue as to what ought to be. Reality was something else again. Constitutional reality was that the status of inhabitants of the United States, white or Negro, was fixed by the Constitution. Social reality was that the great mass of Negroes were slaves.

Inevitably, then, the first skirmishes as to the rights claimed for Negroes had to be fought out in the case of free Negroes.[15] The targets here were northern black laws—the laws in Ohio and Connecticut; the techniques were persuasion, conversion, and demonstration. It was in the course of this campaign that what presently became the constitutional trinity of the antislavery movement received its decisive synthesis.

The first comprehensive crystallization of antislavery constitutional theory occurred in 1834 in the arguments of W. W. Ellsworth and Calvin Goddard, two of the outstanding lawyers and statesmen of Connecticut, on the appeal[16] of the conviction of Prudence Crandall for violation of an ordinance forbidding the education of non-resident colored persons without the consent of the civil authorities.[17] They reveal this theory as based on broad natural rights premises and on an ethical interpretation of American origins and history. Four ideals were central and interrelated: the ideal of human equality, the ideal of a general and equal law, the ideal of reciprocal protection and allegiance, and the ideal of reason and substantially as the true bases for the necessary discriminations and classifications by government. Race as a standard breached every one of these ideals, as did color. What was attacked was denial of human equality and denial of protection of the laws—denials inherent in any racial discrimination backed by public authority. Slavery was the arch evil in this respect, and the primary one, both because of the magnitude of its denials and deprivations and abridgments, and because these necessarily established a whole pattern of discrimination based upon race and color alone. It was this pattern of public discrimination that was combatted no less than slavery. It had to be combatted because it was deemed a part of slavery.

Although neither slavery nor segregated schools was the issue in the case, the Ellsworth-Goddard argument is one of the classic statements of the social and ethical case for equality of opportunity irrespective of race. It gave immense impetus to the emerging concept of American nationality and citizenship. Fully reported and widely circulated as a tract, it soon became one of the fountainheads of antislavery constitutional theory. It figured prominently in Abolitionist writings throughout the 'thirties. In the spring of 1835, Judge William Jay, Abolitionist son of the first Chief Justice and one of the founders and vice-presidents of the American Anti-Slavery Society, devoted fifteen pages of his Inquiry into the Character and Tendency of the Colonization and Anti-Slavery Societies [18] to a slashing attack on the trial court's decision.

The due process element of our modern trilogy was introduced in the course of a determined attack made in 1835 by the Weld-Birney group upon Ohio's black laws. Enacted in 1807, these laws embodied prohibtions against Negro immigration, employment, education, and testimony. A report [19] prepared at Weld's direction by a committee of the newly formed Ohio Anti-Slavery Society appealed to the American and Christian conscience. Notwithstanding the affirmative duty of all government to "promote the happiness and secure the rights and liberties of man," and despite the fact that American government was predicated on the "broad and universal principle of equal and unalienable rights," these statutes had singled out a "weak and defenseless class of citizens—a class convicted of no crime —no natural inferiority," and had invidiously demanded their exclusion from "the rights and privileges of citizenship." This, it was argued, the Constitution forbade. "Our Constitution does not say, All men of a certain color are entitled to certain rights, and are born free and independent. . . . The expression is unlimited. . . . All men are so born, and have the unalienable rights of life and liberty —the pursuit of happiness, and the acquisition and possession of wealth."

These were the doctrinal cornerstones.[20] They were the heart of the ethico-moral-historical-natural rights argument which the American Anti-Slavery Society broadcast in the mid- and late-'thirties. They were broadcast particularly throughout Ohio, western New York and Pennsylvania, [20] It is not implied that these arguments were without antecedents. Earlier (1819-21) in the controversy over Missouri's admission, the provision in its Constitution prohibiting immigration of free Negroes prompted antislavery arguments based on the republican form of government and comity clauses. See BURGESS, THE MIDDLE PERIOD, 1817-58 c. 4 (1897); MCLAUGHLIN, CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES c. 29 (1935); WILSON, RISE AND FALL OF THE SLAVE POWER cc. 11-12 (1872), especially at 154.

Later, the Horton episode, and the protracted controversy over southern seamen's laws whereunder northern and British free Negro seamen were confined to quarters or jailed while in southern ports, gave further impetus to theories of national or American citizenship. The former was a cause célèbre of 1826-1827 involving a statute of the District of Columbia which authorized sale for jail fees of suspected fugitive slaves. Horton, a free Negro of New York, who had been arrested and threatened with sale, was saved by timely aid of Abolitionist friends who capitalized the incident. See JAY, MISCELLANEOUS WRITINGS ON SLAVERY 48, 238-242 (1853); TUCKERMAN, WILLIAM JAY AND THE CONSTITUTIONAL MOVEMENT FOR ABOLITION OF SLAVERY 31-33 (1893); 3 CONG. DEB. 555 (1826). (1843).

Later, in 1844, the Hoar incident occurred, in which Judge Samuel Hoar of Massachusetts, proceeding to Charleston to defend imprisoned Negro seamen, was expelled from South Carolina by legislative resolution. See Hamer, supra, and the elaborate documentation in STATE DOCUMENTS ON FEDERAL RELATIONS: THE STATES AND THE UNITED STATES 237-238 (Ames ed. 1904).

The Hoar expulsion and the numerous laws, both North and South, excluding free Negroes and mulattoes, were cited repeatedly in the debates of the 'fifties and in 1866. See, for example, CONG. GLOBE, 39th Cong., 1st Sess. 475 (1866) (Remarks of Sen. Trumbull).

Rhode Island, and Massachusetts.[21] Weld was the director and master strategist; Birney, the forensic quartermaster and attorney general. The "Twelve" and the "Seventy" were the chosen instruments. These were the two dedicated hand-picked groups of trained teachers, ministers, divinity students, self-named after the early Christian Apostles. Their revivals converted thousands before funds ran out and southern antagonism crippled the movement. Numerous anti-slavery newspapers and coordinated pamphlet and petition campaigns were reinforcing media.

The trouble, of course, was that northerners were still largely indifferent to or unreached by this program, while the South rejected it almost without a hearing. Coincidence played a great part here. Alarmed lest educated Negroes foment slave insurrections, the South further tightened its controls.[22] Fortuitously, the Vesey and Turner uprisings had seemed to offer frightening confirmation of fears in this regard. Meanwhile, cotton profits and politics had begun to rationalize slavery as "a positive good." The insidious belief spread that the South must insulate herself, safeguard her "peculiar institutions," and remove them even from discussion and criticism.[23] In the Pinckney Report of 1836,[24] pro-slave theorists sought to implement these convictions. To reinforce Calhoun's defensive doctrines of concurrent majority and state interposition, and in a determined attempt to protect slavery in the Federal District from possible interference or abolition by Congress under its sweeping powers over the District and territories, Pinckney and his colleagues in the House employed the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment and "the principles of natural justice and of the social compact." [25]

3. The Political Action Campaign

A. Systemization

Thus, the antislavery campaign was set back, its piecemeal conversion and demonstration program was frustrated at the outset by barriers that held slavery to be a positive good—untouchable even where Congress had full powers over it. Antislavery men were denied the use of the mails. Their antislavery petitions were throttled by Congressional "gags". They were forced to defend even their own rights to speak and write and proselytize. In consequence, the antislavery leaders had to reorient their whole movement and strategy.[26]

This reorientation, greatly accelerated by the Pinckney Report, was marked by rapid "constitutionalization" of the higher law argument. There was a shift from an overwhelming faith in moral suasion to a reluctant resort to political action, from efforts to convince Americans of the expediency and justice of freeing their slaves, to a search for constitutional power to free them.[27]

These tendencies may be traced today in the pages of the Weld-Grimke and Birney Letters, in a vast pamphlet literature, in annual reports of the state and national societies,[28] but most satisfactorily in the columns of Birney's Philanthropist.[29] Calhoun and "positive good" theorists had fashioned a constitional system that promised absolute protection for slavery and ignored the constitutional reference to slaves as "persons," referring to them whenever possible as "property." These theorists also employed the "compact" and "compromises" of 1787 as a device that removed slavery from the reach not merely of state and federal legislatures but from adverse discussion and criticism.

Birney and his colleagues now formulated a counter-system, one which exalted liberty and exploited the founding fathers' use of "persons." Denying all limiting force to the "compact" or "compromises," this group hailed the spirit of the Declaration, of the Constitution, and American institutions generally. They seized on the leading provisions of the state and federal bills of rights as affirmative guarantees of the freedom of the slaves.[30]

[28] Read straight through, the six ANNUAL PROC. AND REP. OF AMERICAN ANTISLAVERY SOCIETY (1833-1839) and the five ANNIVERSARY PROC. OF THE OHIO ANTISLAVERY SOCIETY (1836-1840) reveal the shift from confident evangelism to determined self-defense and political action. Not until after the Pinckney Report (supra note 24), the "Gags" denying antislavery petitions, and the refusal of the South to countenance discussion of the issue, does one find serious interest in political movements and tactics. The THIRD ANNUAL REPORT OF THE A. A. S. S. (May 10, 1836) signed by Elizur Wright is thus the turning point and a catalog of the factors that had reoriented opinion. By the SIXTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE A. A. S. S. (1839), the "imperative necessity of political action" caused Wright to devote much of his space to convincing the still hesitant and divided membership.

[29] Birney's career as an editor can be followed in the BIRNEY LETTERS, op. cit. supra note 11 (see index entries "Philanthropist"), and in his pamphlet NARRATIVE OF THE LATE RIOTOUS PROCEEDINGS AGAINST THE LIBERTY OF THE PRESS IN CINCINNATI (1836).

[30] Sometimes Abolitionists, in desperation, appealed to a higher law beyond the Constitution, but this was not a consistent argument or one possible within the legal framework.

In his earlier writings,[31] Birney's ethical interpretation of American origins and history was essentially that of the Crandall argument and the Ohio Anti-Slavery Society reports. The natural rights creed of the Declaration, the universality of guarantees of the state bills of rights, the Signers' and the Fathers' known aversion to slavery, the "color blindness" of the Articles of Confederation, the outright prohibition of slavery in the territories by the Northwest Ordinance, and above all, the silence, the euphemisms, the circumlocutions of the Constitution—these were the recurrent and expanding points. Not merely slavery, but all public race discrimination was ethically and morally wrong. It was so because it was a denial of the rights and protections that governments were established to secure.

After the Pinckney Report, however, and especially after the growing mob action against Abolitionists began to make it clear that state bills of rights were not self-executing but rested on local enforcement, Birney re-examined his position. Everywhere there was this anomaly: the great natural and fundamental rights of conscience, inquiry and communication, secured on paper in every constitution, nevertheless were denied and abridged daily for want of sanctions. All men by nature "possessed" these indispensable rights; all constitutions "declared" and "secured" them. It was the bounden duty of all governments "created for the purposes of protection" to safeguard and enforce them. Yet the hard fact was that state and local governments were flagrantly, increasingly derelict. Nothing, southerners argued, could be done about it.

Challenged in this manner, Birney and his aides shifted their ground. They advanced from the old position that the Federal Constitution was neutral—"or at least not pro-slavery"—to the stand that the document was anti-slavery. Constitutionalization of the natural rights agrument proceeded at a much more rapid pace. No longer was the fight waged merely defensively in behalf of the right to proselytize, or counter-defensively to support sweeping Federal powers over the District and territories; more and more the antislavery forces took the offensive against slavery itself.[32]

Thus, by December 1836, the Abolitionists' argument was recrystallizing around three major propositions:

First, the great natural and fundamental rights of life, liberty, and property, long deemed inherent and inalienable, were now held to be secured by both state and national constitutions.

Second, notwithstanding this double security, and in disregard of the obligation of governments to extend protection in return for allegiance, these rights were being violated with impunity both on national soil and in the states, (a) by the fact of slavery itself, (b) by mob action directed against those working for abolition, (c) by flagrant discriminations against free Negroes and mulattoes.

Third, race and color—"grades and shades"—whenever and wherever employed as criteria and determinants of fundamental rights, violated both the letter and spirit of American institutions; race per se was not only an ignoble standard; it was an irrational and unsubstantial one.

The problems of implementing this theory, Birney worked out in several series of articles during 1837. Rescrutinizing the document, he began to make the same rigorous use of the Federal Bill of Rights that previously he and others had made of Ohio's. Ultimately, he focused on the due process clause employed in Pinckney's Report:[33]

> "The Constitution contains provisions which, if literally carried out, would extinguish the entire system of slavery. It guarantees to every state in the union a republican form of government, Art. IV, Sec. 4th. A majority of the people of South Carolina are slaves; can she be said properly to have a republican form of government? It says, that 'the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects . . . against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated.' Slaves, Sir, are men, constitute a portion of the people: Is that no 'unreasonable seizure,' by which the man is deprived of all his earnings [effects?]—by which in fact he is robbed of his own person? Is the perpetual privation of liberty 'no unreasonable seizure'? Suppose this provision of the Constitution were literally and universally enforced; how long would it be before there would not be a single slave to mar the prospect of American liberty? Again, 'no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on the presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, [sic] nor shall any person be compelled in any case to witness against himself; nor be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law.' Art. V Amendments.
>
> "Are slaves ever honored with indictment by a grand jury? Are they never compelled 'to witness against themselves'? never tortured until they lie against their own lives? never deprived of life without 'due process of law'? By what 'due process of law' is it, that two millions of 'persons' are deprived every year of the millions of dollars produced by their labor? By what due process of law is it that [33] Philanthropist, Jan. 13, 1837, p. 2. Birney continued his "Reply to Judge L." in the Jan. 20 and 27, 1837 numbers, and in the former demonstrated his forensic powers by brilliant caricature of the South's efforts to suppress discussion of slavery.

> 56,000 'persons,' the annual increase of the slave population, are annually deprived of their 'liberty'? Such questions may seem impertinent, to Mr. L., but when he shall feel that the slave is a 'person,' in very deed, and has rights, as inalienable as his own, he will acknowledge their propriety. Again 'In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury . . . and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor; and to have the assistance of Counsel for his defense.' Art. VI of the Amendments. Take all the above provisions in connection with that clause under Art. VI, which declares that 'This Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof' etc., 'shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding'—and then carry them out to their full extent, and how long would it be ere slavery would be utterly prostrated? I do not say they were inserted with a specific view toward this end, but I do say, that so long as they shall stand, the Constitution of these U[nited] States will be a perpetual rebuke to the selfishness and injustice of the whole policy of the slaveholder. The provisions embody principles which are at entire enmity with the spirit and practice of slavery. How an instrument, containing such principles, can be tortured to express a sanction to slavery, I am yet to learn.'' [34]

Reassimilation of the old theory into the Bill of Rights now proceeded rapidly.[35] The various clauses restraining the powers of Congress began to be popularly regarded as sources of Congressional power. The initial premise in this regard was that the provisions of the Bill of Rights were not rights, they were guarantees, and guarantees customarily presumed the intent and capacity, as well as the duty, to make them good.[36] An open letter[37] to his Congressman from an unnamed Abolitionist in Batavia[38] reveals the hold and spread and reach of these ideas:

> "The very Constitution of the United States is attempted to be distorted and made an ally of domestic slavery. That Constitution was established, not by the citizens or voters, but by 'the people' of the United States to secure the blessings of liberty and establish justice. The Union . . . was formed for the same great purposes, . . . yet we have been told that petitioning for liberty endangers this Union, that the partnership will be dissolved by extending to all the very right it was intended to secure.
> "Slavery in the District of Columbia violates the most important and sacred principles of the Constitution. . . . I speak not of the mere letter, but of the principles . . . —of the rights it guarantees, of the form, in which the guarantee is expressed. The 5th Amendment declares 'no person shall be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law.' This petition informs you free men in the District . . . have been first imprisoned, and then sold for their jail fees. [Suppose, he continued, this had happened to American seamen in a foreign port]. Would not Congress upon petition enquire into the fact and redress the wrong if it existed? Would not you, Sir, be one of the foremost in repelling the insult to our seamen and punishing the aggressor? Would you not consider it your duty—your official duty to do so? And yet you have no power to dis> criminate in the object of your protection—a colored sailor is entitled to the protection of his country's laws, and Constitution, and flag, and honor, as well as a white one,—he is as much entitled to that protection in Washington city beneath the flag of his country and while he reposes under the tower of the Capitol as he is at Qualla Balloo or Halifax, or anywhere on the face of the earth. And all should be protected with equal and exact justice, whether sailors or laborers—citizens or soldiers: if so, you are bound to enquire into the alleged abuses, and if they exist to redress them."

Thus, by October, 1837, the date of Birney's retirement as editor of the Philanthropist, the motivating premise of Abolitionism already was coming to be this: Americans' basic civil rights were truly national, but in practice their basic civil liberty was not. By acts in support and in toleration of slavery and by failure to protect the friends of the enslaved race, the states and the federal government all abridged, and all allowed to be abridged, the dearest privileges and immunities of citizenship. Humanitarianism had attempted to soften race prejudice and meet this challenge squarely but had been frustrated. Failure left no alternative but political action and the instinctive answer that government had the power to do what the governed had the job to do. The answer to denied power and to defective power was the concept of an inherent power derived from the standing duty to protect. The gist of it was that because allegiance and protection were reciprocal—i.e., ought to be reciprocal—because the government protected its citizens abroad without discrimination, and because the text of the Federal Bill of Rights gave no warrant for discrimination, Congress was duty bound not to discriminate. It must do "equal and exact justice" irrespective of race. It had no other choice. It lacked power to discriminate between those persons who were equally entitled to protection. It was duty bound also to remove such discrimination as existed. Implicitly, and morally, these same obligations rested on the states; yet respect for the constitutional division of power here introduced conflict. Few were yet ready for the extreme proposition that Congress might constitutionally abolish slavery in the states. The original form, as shown by the Batavian communication, was more often that Congress was duty bound to hear petitions to abolish slavery, or that slavery had been abolished in federal territory by the force of the Preamble and Declaration. Because the great natural rights were now also national constitutional rights, they began to generate and carry with them—even into the states—the power for their enforcement.

B. Popularization

Four routes and media of political action "constitutionalizing" the antislavery argument are to be noted.

First were the countless petitions, resolutions, declarations, letters, editorials, speeches, and sermons broadcast by the original antislavery proponents and converts—uniformly men and women of influence and position whose idealism was extraordinary and undoubted. One has to read only the Weld-Grimke and the Birney[39] Letters, or the monographs of Barnes,[40] Dumond[41] and Nye[42]—and Nevins' great history[43]—to realize the appeal of these peoples' character and of their example and argument. Moreover, many of them were southerners, and of the proudest type who practiced what they preached—Birney alone freeing slaves to the value of thousands of dollars,[44] and the Grimke sisters doing likewise with those they inherited. Every antislavery society was a band of disciples, workers, petitioners, writers, and "free moral agents" committed to the spread of doctrine that had immense intrinsic appeal.

[39] The legal and constitutional argument in the BIRNEY LETTERS is remarkable both in range and interest. Note especially the due process arguments at 293, 647, 805-806, 835; the declaration that colored people are "citizens" at 815, and "persons" at 658 and 835; the exceptionally strong references to "natural equality of men" at 272; the composite synthesis of all these elements in the Declaration of 1848 drafted by William Goodell at 1048-1057; the various references to major law cases at 386-387 (Nancy Jackson v. Bulloch, 12 Conn. 38 (1837)), at page 658, 667-670 (Birney's arguments in The Creole, 2 Moore, Digest of International Law 358-361 (1906), for which Weld did much of the research), at 758 (Jones v. Van Zandt, 46 U. S. 215 (1846)) in which Salmon P. Chase was of counsel). By contrast, the legal argument in the WELD-GRIMKE LETTERS is more limited, but see page 798 for the letter of Ebenezer Chaplin, an Athol, Massachusetts physician, to Weld, dated October 1, 1839, urging greater emphasis on the unconstitutionality of slavery and less on its cruelties, and specifically mentioning the Declaration of Independence, the common law, the Ordinance of 1787, the Preamble, and the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment.

In consequence, simply as an incident of the intense revival campaigns, the equal protection-due process-privileges and immunities theory became the core of thousands of abolitionist petitions, resolutions, and lectures. Now one, now another of the elements was accented, depending on the need and circumstances, but in an astonishing number of cases two or three parts of the trilogy were used. The whole thus became, even before 1840, a form of popular constitutional shorthand.

After that date even stronger forces enter the picture. First, were the compilers and synthesizers—pamphleteers and journalists like Tiffany[45] and Goodell[46] and Mellen[47] who wrote the articles and treatises on the "Unconstitutionality of Slavery" which Dr. tenBroek analyzes so well.[48] Others annotated copies of Our National Charters[49] setting down after each clause or phrase of the Constitution and the Declaration (much as Birney had done in his early articles) antislavery arguments and doctrines gleaned "both from reason and authority." Such materials, broadcast by the thousand, reprinted, condensed and paraphrased, were themselves powerful disseminators.

It was the minority party platform that gave antislavery theory its most concise, effective statement. Drafted generally by Salmon P. Chase or Joshua R. Giddings, these documents, first of the Liberty and Free Soil parties in the 'forties, then of the Free Democracy and Republican parties in the 'fifties, and in 1860, all made use, in slightly varying combination, of the cardinal articles of faith: human equality, protection, and equal protection from the Declaration, and due process both as a restraint and a source of congressional power. Such consistent repetition testifies both to the nature and extent of previous distillations and to the power and significance of current ones:

1. Liberty Party Platform (adopted in 1843 for the 1844 campaign):

> "Resolved, That the fundamental truth of the Declaration of Independence, that all men are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, was made the fundamental law of our national government by that amendment of the Constitution which declares that no person shall

2. Free Soil Party Platform, 1848:

"Resolved, That our fathers ordained the Constitution of the United States in order, among other great national objects, to establish justice, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty, but expressly denied to the federal government, which they created, all constitutional power to deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due legal process.

"Resolved, that, in the judgment of this convention, Congress has no more power to make a slave than to make a king; no more power to institute or establish slavery than to institute or establish a monarchy. No such power can be found among those specifically conferred by the Constitution, or derived by any just implication from them."[51]

3. Free Democracy Platform, 1852:

"1. That governments deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed are instituted among men to secure to all those unalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness with which they are endowed by their Creator, and of which none can be deprived by valid legislation, except for crime.

4. Republican Party Platform, 1856:

"Resolved, That with our republican fathers we hold it be a self-evident truth, that all men are endowed with the unalienable rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and that the primary object and ulterior designs of our federal government were to secure these rights to all persons within its exclusive jurisdiction; that, as our republican fathers, when they had abolished slavery in all our national territory, ordained that no person should be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, it becomes our duty to maintain this provision of the Constitution against all attempts to violate it for the purpose of establishing slavery in any Territory of the United States, by positive legislation prohibiting its existence or extension therein; that we deny the authority of Congress, of a territorial legislature, of any individual or association of individuals, to give legal existence to slavery in any Territory of the United States, while the present Constitution shall be maintained."[53]

True, these were party platforms, but these were the platforms of parties to which leaders in the Congress that would frame the Fourteenth Amendment had given their allegiance.[55]

Many Congressmen whose names later loomed large in the formulation of and debates on the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Amendments and the Civil Rights Acts were men of anti-slavery backgrounds[56] which, it will be recalled, had sought out community leaders, particularly

In addition to the western group of antislavery leaders, there was an equally strong and determined group with its focus in New England. From this group emerged Charles Sumner, Wendell Phillips, and Henry Wilson. Sumner later became one of the most intransigent leaders of the Republican party during and after the Civil War.[70] Wilson was also in Congress during the Reconstruction period; and became Vice-President and voted with the Radicals on important tie votes.[71] Other New Englanders who served in Congress, and were members of the Joint Committee on Reconstruction, include William Pitt Fessenden of Maine, Justin Morrill of Vermont, and George S. Because Bingham is known to have drafted Sections One and Five of the Fourteenth Amendment, his speeches are of special interest. From 1855-63 and from 1865-73, he represented the Twenty-first Ohio District, which included the Cadiz-Mt. Pleasant Quaker settlements, antislavery strongholds. Furthermore, as a youth he had attended Franklin College at New Athens in 1837-38. At that date Franklin was second only to Oberlin as an antislavery stronghold;[73] the Weld-Birney crusade was at its height. Indeed, in Birney's Philanthropist, 1836-37, we find various antislavery petitions and resolutions from the Cadiz and Mt. Pleasant societies.[74] These are couched in the very phraseology for which Bingham in 1856-66 manifested his decisive preference.

Four of Bingham's speeches are of particular significance:

I. In his maiden speech in the House, March 6, 1856, attacking laws recently passed by the Kansas pro-slavery legislature which declared it a felony even to agitate against slavery, Bingham argued:

> "These infamous statutes . . . [contravene] the Constitution of the United States. . . . [A]ny territorial enactment which makes it a felony for a citizen of the United States, within the territory of the United States 'to know, to argue and to utter freely', according to conscience is absolutely void. . . . [A] felony to utter there, in the hearing of a slave, upon American soil, beneath the American flag . . . the words of the Declaration 'All men are born free and equal, and endowed by their Creator with the inalienable rights of life and liberty;' . . . [A] felony to utter . . . those other words. . . . 'We, the people of the United States, in order to > establish justice,' the attribute of God, and 'to secure liberty,' the imperishable right of man, do 'ordain this Constitution'. . . . It is too late to make it a felony to utter the self-evident truth that life and liberty belong of right to every man. . . . This pretended legislation . . . violates the Constitution in this—that it abridges the freedom of speech and of the press, and deprives persons of liberty without due process of law, or any process but that of brute force, while the Constitution provides that Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press; and it expressly prescribes that 'no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.'" [75]

II. On January 13, 1857, Bingham spoke in support of Congress' power over slavery in the territory and attacked President Buchanan's recent defense of the Kansas-Nebraska Act of 1854 repealing the Missouri Compromise. After a long analysis of the provisions of the Federal Bill of Rights, of the Northwest Ordinance, the enabling acts and constitutions of the states carved from the Ohio Territory—emphasizing especially the Federal due process clause and the "all men are born equally free and independent" clauses of the state constitution, he said:

> "The Constitution is based upon EQUALITY of the human race. . . . A State formed under the Constitution and pursuant to its spirit, must rest upon this great principle of EQUALITY. Its primal object must be to protect each human being within its jurisdiction in the free and full enjoyment of his natural rights. . . .

[75] CONG. GLOBE, 34th Cong., 1st Sess. app. 124 (1856). Three other antislavery Republicans representing constituencies converted in the Weld-Birney crusade also used all the old rhetoric and theory including due process: Rep. Granger (N. Y.) id. at 295-296; Reps. Edward Wade (id. at 1076-1081) and Philemon Bliss (id. at 553-557), both Ohioans and among Weld's early converts. See also the speech of Rep. Schuyler Colfax (Ind.), id. at 644.

"It must be apparent that the absolute equality of all, and the equal protection of each, are principles of our Constitution, which ought to be observed and enforced in the organization and admission of new States. The Constitution provides . . . that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law. It makes no distinction either on account of complexion or birth—it secures these rights to all persons within its exclusive jurisdiction. This is equality. It protects not only life and liberty, but also property, the product of labor. It contemplates that no man shall be wrongfully deprived of the fruit of his toil any more than of his life." [76]

III. On January 25, 1858, attacking "The Lecompton Conspiracy"—the proposed pro-slave constitution of Kansas declaring that only "All freemen, when they form a compact, are equal in rights,"—and absolutely barring free Negroes from the state, Bingham declared:

"The [Federal] Constitution . . . declares upon its face that no person, whether white or black, shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, but by due process of law; and that it was ordained by the people to establish justice! . . . [By sanctioning these provisions] we are asked to say, that the self-evident truth of the Declaration, 'that ALL MEN ARE CREATED EQUAL' is a self-evident lie. . . . We are to say . . . to certain human beings in the Territory of Kansas, though you were born in this Territory, and born of free parents, though you are human beings, and no chattel, yet you are not free to live here . . .; you must be disseized of your freehold liberties and privileges, without the judgment of your peers and without the protection of law. Though born here, you shall not, under any circumstances, be permitted to live here." [77]

IV. On February 11, 1859, Bingham attacked the admission of Oregon because its constitution forbade immigration of free Negroes and contained other discriminations against them:

> "[T]his constitution . . . is repugnant to the Federal Constitution, and violative of the rights of citizens of the United States. . . .
>
> "Who are citizens of the United States? They are those, and those only, who owe allegiance to the Government of the United States; not the base allegiance imposed upon the Saxon by the Conqueror . . .; but the allegiance which requires the citizen not only to obey, but to support and defend, if need be with his life, the Constitution of his country. All free persons born and domiciled within the jurisdiction of the United States; all aliens by act of naturalization, under the laws of the United States."

"The people of the several States", who according to the Constitution are to choose the representatives in Congress, and to whom political powers were reserved by the Tenth Amendment, were to Bingham "the same community, or body politic, called by the Preamble . . . 'the people of the United States' ". Moreover, certain "distinctive political rights"—for example the right to choose representatives and officers of the United States, to hold such offices, etc.—were conferred only on "citizens of the United States."

> ". . . I invite attention to the significant fact that natural or inherent rights, which belong to all men irrespective of all conventional regulations, are by this Constitution guaranteed by the broad and comprehensive word 'person,' as contradistinguished from the limited term citizen—as in the fifth article of amendments, guarding those sacred rights which are as universal and indestructible as the human race, that 'no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, but by due process of law, nor shall private property be taken without just compensation.' And this guarantee applies to all citizens within the United States."

Against infringement of "these wise and beneficent guarantees of political rights to the citizens of the United States as such, and of natural rights to all persons, whether citizens or strangers," stood the supremacy clause.

"There, sir, is the limitation upon State sovereignty—simple, clear, and strong. No State may rightfully, by Constitution or statute law, impair any of these guarantied rights, either political or natural. They may not rightfully or lawfully declare that the strong citizens may deprive the weak citizens of their rights, natural or political. . . .

". . . This provision [excluding free Negroes and mulattoes] seems to me . . . injustice and oppression incarnate. This provision, sir, excludes from the State of Oregon eight hundred thousand of the native-born citizens of the other States, who are, therefore, citizens of the United States. I grant you that a State may restrict the exercise of the elective franchise to certain classes of citizens of the United States, to the exclusion of others; but I deny that any State may exclude a law abiding citizen of the United States from coming within its territory, or abiding therein, or acquiring and enjoying property therein, or from the enjoyment therein of the 'privileges and immunities' of a citizen of the United States. What says the Constitution:

" 'The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.

Art. 4, Section 2.'

"Here is no qualification. . . . The citizens of each State, all the citizens of each State, being citizens of the United States, shall be entitled to 'all privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States.' Not to the rights and immunities of the several States; not to those constitutional rights and immunities which result exclusively from State authority or State legislation; but to 'all privileges and immunities' of citizens of the United States in the several States. There is an ellipsis in the language employed in the Constitution, but its meaning is self-evident that it is 'the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States . . .' that it guaranties. . . .

BLEED THROUGH

". . . [S]ir, I maintain that the persons thus excluded from the State by this section of the Oregon Constitution, are citizens by birth of the several States, and therefore are citizens of the United States, and as such are entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, amongst which are the rights of life and liberty and property, and their due protection in the enjoyment thereof by law; . . . .

"Who, sir, are citizens of the United States? First, all free persons born and domiciled within the United States—not all free white persons, but all free persons. You will search in vain, in the Constitution of the United States, for that word white; it is not there. You will look in vain for it in that first form of national Government—the Articles of Confederation; it is not there. The omission of this word—this phrase of caste—from our national charter, was not accidental, but intentional. . . .

". . . This Government rests upon the absolute equality of natural rights amongst men. . . .

". . . Who . . . will be bold enough to deny that all persons are equally entitled to the enjoyment of the rights of life and liberty and property; and that no one should be deprived of life or liberty, but as punishment for crime; nor of his property, against his consent and without due compensation? . . .

"The equality of all to the right to live; to the right to know; to argue and to utter, according to conscience; to work and enjoy the product of their toil, is the rock on which that Constitution rests— . . . . The charm of that Constitution lies in the great democratic idea which it embodies, that all men, > before the law, are equal in respect of those rights of person which God gives and no man or State may rightfully take away, except as a forfeiture for crime. Before your Constitution, sir, as it is, as I trust it ever will be, all men are sacred, whether white or black. . . ."[78]

Several points must here be emphasized. It will be noted that Bingham disavows the color line as a basis for citizenship of the United States; that he regards Milton's rights of communication and conscience, including the right to know, to education, as one of the great fundamental natural "rights of person which God gives and no man or state may rightfully take away," and which hence are "embodied" also within, and secured by, "the great democratic idea that all men before the law are equal." In short, the concept and guarantee of the equal protection of the laws is already "embodied" in the Federal Constitution as of 1859; this same concept, moreover, embraces "the equality of all . . . to the right to know"; and above all, there is no color line in the Constitution, even of 1859.

Conclusions

From this consideration of the historical background against which the Fourteenth Amendment was written, submitted by Congress, and ratified by the requisite number of states, these important facts develop:

1. To the opponents of slavery, equality was an absolute, not a relative, concept which comprehended that no legal recognition be given to racial distinctions of any kind. Their theories were formulated with reference to the free Negro as well as to slavery—that great reservoir of prejudice and evil that fed the whole system of racial distinctions and caste. The notion that any state could impose such distinctions was totally incompatible with antislavery doctrine.

2. These proponents of absolute equalitarianism emerged victorious in the Civil War and controlled the Congress that wrote the Fourteenth Amendment. Ten of the fifteen members of the Joint Committee on Reconstruction were men who had antislavery backgrounds.

3. The phrases—"privileges and immunities," "equal protection," and "due process"—that were to appear in the Amendment had come to have specific significance to opponents of slavery. Proponents of slavery, even as they disagreed, knew and understood what that significance was. Members of the Congress that formulated and submitted the Amendment shared that knowledge and understanding. When they translated the antislavery concepts into constitutional provisions, they employed these by now traditional phrases that had become freighted with equalitarian meaning in its widest sense.

APPEALS FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURTS FOR THE DISTRICT OF KANSAS, THE EASTERN DISTRICT OF SOUTH CAROLINA AND THE EASTERN DISTRICT OF VIRGINIA, AND ON PETITION FOR A WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE SUPREME COURT OF DELAWARE, RESPECTIVELY.

BRIEF FOR APPELLANTS IN NOS. 1, 2 AND 3 AND FOR RESPONDENTS IN NO. 5 ON FURTHER REARGUMENT

Preliminary Statement

On May 17, 1954, this Court disposed of the basic constitutional question presented in these cases by deciding that racial segregation in public education is unconstitutional. The Court said, however, that the formulation of decrees was made difficult "because these are class actions, because of the wide applicability of this decision and because of the great variety of local conditions . . . ." The cases were restored to the docket, and the parties were requested to present further argument on Questions 4 and 5 previously propounded by the Court for the reargument last Term.

Questions Involved

Questions 4 and 5, left undecided and now the subject of discussion in this brief, follow:

4. Assuming it is decided that segregation in public schools violates the Fourteenth Amendment

   (a) would a decree necessarily follow providing that, within the limits set by normal geographic school districting, Negro children should forthwith be admitted to schools of their choice, or

   (b) may this Court, in the exercise of its equity powers, permit an effective gradual adjustment to be brought about from existing segregated systems to a system not based on color distinctions?

5. On the assumption on which question 4(a) and (b) are based, and assuming further that this Court will exercise its equity powers to the end described in question 4(b),

   (a) should this Court formulate detailed decrees in these cases;

BLEED THROUGH

(b) if so, what specific issues should the decrees reach;

(c) should this Court appoint a special master to hear evidence with a view to recommending specific terms for such decrees;

(d) should this Court remand to the courts of first instance with directions to frame decrees in these cases, and if so, what general directions should the decrees of this Court include and what procedures should the courts of first instance follow in arriving at the specific terms of more detailed decrees?

Developments in These Cases Since the Last Argument

The Kansas Case

On September 3, 1953, the Topeka School Board adopted the following resolution:

> Be it resolved that it is the policy of the Topeka Board of Education to terminate the maintenance of segregation in the elementary schools as rapidly as is practicable.

On September 8, 1953, appellees ordered segregation terminated in two of the nineteen school districts in Topeka. In September, 1954, segregation was completely terminated in ten other school districts and partially in two.

There is now a total school enrollment of approximately 8,500 children of elementary school age attending 23 elementary schools. Of the 8,500 children enrolled, approximately 700 Negro children are in four elementary schools for Negroes. There are 123 Negro children now attending schools on a non-segregated basis pursuant to appellees' implementation of its policy of removing segregation from the public school system. The blunt truth is that 85% of the Negro children in Topeka's elementary schools are still being denied the constitutional rights for which appellants sought redress in their original action.

While Topeka has been effectuating its plan, several other cities of the first class have undertaken the abolition of segregated schools. Lawrence and Pittsburg have completely desegregated. Kansas City, Abilene, Leavenworth and Parsons have ordered partial desegregation. Wichita and Salina have revised their school regulations to permit Negro children to attend schools nearest their homes. Only Coffeeville and Fort Scott have not taken any affirmative action whatsoever.

The Delaware Case

By order of the Court of Chancery, affirmed by the Supreme Court of Delaware, the named plaintiffs were immediately admitted to the schools to which they applied. These plaintiffs and other members of the class are in their third year of uninterrupted attendance in the two Delaware schools named in the order. That attendance has been marked by no untoward incident. The order, however, did not result in elimination of separate schools for Negroes in the two school districts involved, in each of which one segregated elementary school is yet maintained by petitioners.

The State Board of Education has statutory authority to "exercise general control and supervision over the public schools of the State, including . . . the determination of the educational policies of the State and the seeking in every way to direct and develop public sentiment in support of public education." Delaware Code, Title 14, Section 121 (1953). Accordingly, the State Board of Education, on June 11, 1954, adopted a statement of "Policies Regarding Desegregation of Schools of the State" and announced "a general policy" that it "intends to carry out the mandates of the United States Supreme Court decision as expeditiously as possible." It further requested that "the school authorities together with interested citizen groups throughout the State should take immediate steps to hold discussions for the purpose of (1) formulating plans for desegregation in their respective districts and (2) presenting said plans to the State Board of Education for review."

On August 19, 1954, the State Board of Education requested "that all schools, maintaining four or more teachers, present a tentative plan for desegregation in their area on or before October 1, 1954."

The desegregation plans of the Claymont Board of Education, whose members are petitioners here, providing for the complete termination of segregation, were approved by the State Board of Education on August 26, 1954. These plans have been partially put into operation.

No plan ending segregation in the Hockessin schools, the other Delaware area in the litigation here, has yet been formulated.

Delaware statutes provide for two types of public school districts, exclusive of the public school system in Wilmington which is practically autonomous. One type is commonly known as the State Board District. As to it, the statute provides that the "Board of School Trustees shall be the representative in the District of the State Board of Education." DELAWARE CODE, Title 14, Section 702 (1953). There are 98 such units. The other type is the Special School District, concerning which the statute provides that "There shall be a Board of Education which shall be responsible for the general administration and supervision of the free public schools and educational interests of the District." DELAWARE CODE, Title 14, Section 902 (1953). There are fifteen Special School Districts.

Desegregation in the school districts of Delaware is illustrated by the table below:

STATE BOARD DISTRICTS

	Partial Desegregation	Complete Desegregation	No Desegregation	Total

Wilmington, which is in New Castle County and contains 34% of the population of the State, in June desegregated all elementary and secondary schools for the 1954 summer session. It has also completely desegregated its night school sessions. Beginning in September, 1954, desegregation of all elementary schools was effectuated, with some integration of teachers.

---

* Partial desegregation, that is, on the high school level, was instituted by the Milford Board of Education, in Sussex County. This action was later revoked and a test of the revocation is now pending in the Delaware courts. See Simmons v. Steiner, 108 A. 2d 173 (Del. Ct. Chanc. 1954). In that case the Vice-Chancellor found the Negro plaintiffs' rights to remain as students in Milford High School "clear and convincing" and restrained the Board of Education from excluding them. However, the Supreme Court of Delaware temporarily stayed the injunction to give that court sufficient time to examine "serious questions of law." Argument has been scheduled for December 13, 1954. • Steiner v. Simmons (Del. Sup. Ct. No. 27, 1954).

BLEED THROUGH

The school districts involved in this litigation also are in New Castle County, which has 68% of the State's population. Desegregation in varying degrees has started in every major school district in this county, except one.

The State Board of Education has made specific requests to 58 of the 113 school districts in the State to submit such plans. Another six districts have stated that any kind of plan they may have would be more or less nullified by overcrowded classroom conditions. Fourteen others have indicated that they desire to await the mandate of this Court. The remaining districts have not responded to the State Board.

In summary, school districts in areas comprising more than 50% of the population of Delaware have undertaken some desegregation of the public schools. Many school districts in semi-urban and rural areas have undertaken no step. The ultimate responsibility for effectuating desegregation throughout Delaware rests with petitioners here, members of the State Board of Education.

The South Carolina Case

Since May 17, 1954, South Carolina's fifteen-man legislative "Segregation Study Committee" was reorganized and has conferred with the Governor, State education officials, other legislators and spokesmen from various civic and teacher organizations. All of their meetings have been closed to the public. The Committee also visited Louisiana and Mississippi "to observe what was being done in those states to preserve segregated schools."

On July 28, the committee issued an interim report which recommended that public schools be operated during the coming year "in keeping with previously established policy." The committee construed its assignment as being the formulation of courses of action whereby the State could continue public education "without unfortunate disruption by outside forces and influences which have no knowledge of recent progress and no understanding of the problems of the present and future. . . ." Moreover, the report stated that the committee also recognized "the need for a system in keeping with public opinion and established traditions and living patterns."

The State Attorney General insisted that this Court should not undertake to direct further action even by the school district involved and announced that he considered the Clarendon County case "purely a local matter as far as the parties to the suit are concerned."

In Rock Hill (population 25,000 with 20% Negroes) a Catholic grade school voluntarily desegregated. Opening day enrollment was 29 white students and five Negroes. There has been no report of overt action against this development; but the parents of some of the children have been remonstrated with by neighbors and workers.[1]

A newspaper report [1a] of a public speech of E. B. McCord, one of the appellees herein, superintendent of education for Clarendon County, states in part:

> There will be no mixed schools in Clarendon County as long as there is any possible way for present leadership to prevent them.
>
> So declared L. B. McCord of Manning, Clarendon County superintendent of education, in an address before the Lions Club here Monday night.
>
> Decrying the fact that "Our churches seem to be letting their zeal run away in leading the way," he denounced de-segregation as contrary to the Scriptures and to good sense.

The Virginia Case

On May 27, 1954, the State Board of Education advised city and county school boards to continue segregation during the present school year.

BLEED THROUGH

On August 28, the Governor named a thirty-two-man, all-white legislative commission to study the problems raised by the Court's ruling and to prepare a report and recommendations to the legislature and to him. The Governor then announced:

> . . . I am inviting the commission to ascertain, through public hearings and such other means as appear appropriate, the wishes of the people of Virginia; to give careful study to plans or legislation or both, that should be considered for adoption in Virginia after the final decree of the Court is entered, and to offer such other recommendations as it may deem proper as a result of the decision of the Supreme Court affecting the public schools.[2]

At its first meeting the commission adopted a rule that:

> All meetings of the commission shall be executive and its deliberations confidential, except when the meeting consists of a public hearing or it is otherwise expressly decided by the commission.[3]

By October, the local school boards or boards of supervisors of approximately 25 of the state's 98 counties had adopted and forwarded to the Governor resolutions urging the continuation of segregated schools.

In May, 1954, the Richmond Diocese of the Roman Catholic Church, which includes all but 6 of Virginia's counties, announced that during the Fall of 1954, Negroes would for the first time be admitted to previously all-white Catholic parochial schools where there was no separate parochial school for Negroes. Approximately 40 Negro pupils of a total of 3,527 are enrolled in four high and six elementary parochial schools formerly attended only by white pupils. The Superintendent of the Richmond Diocese states that integration in these schools "has worked out magnificiently, without a ripple of discontent, ..."[4]

ARGUMENT

I.

Answering Question 4: Only a Decree Requiring Desegregation as Quickly as Prerequisite Administrative and Mechanical Procedures Can Be Completed Will Discharge Judicial Responsibility for the Vindication of the Constitutional Rights of Which Appellants Are Being Deprived.

In the normal course of judicial procedure, this Court's decision that racial segregation in public education is unconstitutional would be effectuated by decrees forthwith enjoining the continuation of that segregation. Indeed, in Sipuel v. Board of Regents, 332 U. S. 631, when effort was made to secure postponement of the enforcement of similar rights, this Court not only refused to delay action but accelerated the granting of relief by ordering its mandate to issue forthwith.

In practical effect, such disposition of this litigation would require immediate initiation of the administrative procedures prerequisite to desegregation, to be followed by the admission of the complaining children and others similarly situated to unsegregated schools at the beginning of the next academic term. This means that appellees will have had from May 17, 1954, to September, 1955, to complete whatever adjustments may be necessary.

---

[4] Id. at p. 14, col. 5.

BLEED THROUGH

If appellees desire any postponement of relief beyond that date, the affirmative burden must be on them to state explicitly what they propose and to establish that the requested postponement has judicially cognizable advantages greater than those inherent in the prompt vindication of appellants' adjudicated constitutional rights. Moreover, when appellees seek to postpone the enjoyment of rights which are personal and present, Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629; Sipuel v. Board of Regents, 332 U. S. 631, that burden is particularly heavy. When the rights of school children are involved the burden is even greater. Each day relief is postponed is to the appellants * a day of serious and irreparable injury; for this Court has announced that segregation of Negroes in the public schools "generates a feeling of inferiority as to their status in the community that may affect their hearts and minds in a way unlikely ever to be undone. . . ." And, time is of the essence because the period of public school attendance is short.

A. Aggrieved Parties Showing Denial of Constitutional Rights in Analogous Situations Have Received Immediate Relief Despite Arguments For Delay More Persuasive Than Any Available Here.

Where a substantial constitutional right would be impaired by delay, this Court has refused to postpone injunctive relief even in the face of the gravest of public considerations suggested as justification therefor. In Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co. v. Sawyer, 343 U. S. 579, this Court upheld the issuance of preliminary injunctions restraining the Government's continued possession of steel mills seized under Presidential order intended to avoid a work stoppage that would imperil the national defense during the Korean conflict. The Government argued that even though the seizure might be unconstitutional, the public interest in uninterrupted production of essential war materials was superior to the owners' rights to the immediate return of their properties. It is significant that in the seven opinions filed no Justice saw any merit in this position. If equity could not appropriately exercise its broad discretion to withhold the immediate grant of relief in the Youngstown case, such a postponement must certainly be inappropriate in these cases where no comparable overriding consideration can be suggested.

Similarly in Ex parte Endo, 323 U. S. 283, this Court rejected the Government's argument that hardship and disorder resulting from racial prejudice could justify delay in releasing the petitioner. There, the argument made by the Government to justify other than immediate relief was summarized in the Court's opinion as follows (pp. 296-297):

> It is argued that such a planned and orderly relocation was essential to the success of the evacuation program; that but for such supervision there might have been a dangerously disorderly migration of unwanted people to unprepared communities; that unsupervised evacuation might have resulted in hardship and disorder; that the success of the evacuation program was thought to require the knowledge that the Federal government was maintaining control over the evacuated population except as the release of individuals could be effected consistently with their own peace and well-being and that of the nation; that although community hostility towards the evacuees has diminished, it has not disappeared and the continuing control of the Authority over the relocation process is essential to the success of the evacuation program. It is argued that supervised relocation, as the chosen method of terminating the evacuation, is the final step in the entire process and is a consequence of the first step taken. It is conceded that appellant's detention pending compliance with the leave regulations is not directly connected with the prevention of espionage and sabotage at the present time. But it is argued that Executive Order No. 9102 confers power to make regulations > necessary and proper for controlling situations created by the exercise of the powers expressly conferred for protection against espionage and sabotage. The leave regulations are said to fall within that category.

In a unanimous decision, with the Court's opinion by Mr. Justice Douglas and two concurring opinions, the Court held that the petitioner must be given her unconditional liberty because the detention was not permissible by either statutory or administrative authorization. Viewing the petitioner's right as being in that "sensitive area of rights specifically guaranteed by the Constitution" (p. 299), the Court rejected the Government's contention that a continuation of its unlawful course of conduct was necessary to avoid the harmful consequences which otherwise would follow.

It is true that in the Endo case the contention rejected was that an executive order (which on its face did not authorize the petitioner's detention) ought to be extended by "construction" so as to entitle the Relocation Authority to delay the release of the petitioner until it felt that social conditions made it convenient and prudent to do so. In this case, the suggestion is that this Court, in the exercise of its equity powers, ought to withhold appellants' constitutional rights on closely similar grounds. But this is not a decisive distinction. If, as the Endo case held, the enjoyment of a constitutional right may not be deferred by a process of forced construction on the basis of factors closely similar to the ones at work in the instant case, then certainly this Court ought not to find in its equitable discretion a mandate or empowerment to obtain the same result.

In the Endo case, the national interest in time of war was present. In these cases, no such interest exists. Thus, there is even less basis for delaying the immediate enjoyment of appellants' rights.

Counsel have discovered no case wherein this Court has found a violation of a present constitutional right but has postponed relief on the representation by governmental officials that local mores and customs justify delay which might produce a more orderly transition.

It would be paradoxical indeed if, in the instant cases, it were decided for the first time that constitutional rights may be postponed because of anticipation of difficulties arising out of local feelings. These cases are brought to vindicate rights which, as a matter of common knowledge and legal experience, need, above all others, protection against local attitudes and patterns of behavior.[5] They are brought, specifically, to uphold rights under the Fourteenth Amendment which are not to be qualified, substantively or remedially, by reference to local mores. On the contrary, the Fourteenth Amendment, on its face and as a matter of history, was designed for the very purpose of affording protection against local mores and customs, and Congress has implemented that design by providing redress against aggression under color of state laws, customs and usages. 28 U. S. C. § 1343; 42 U. S. C. § 1983.

Surely, appellants' rights are not to be enforced at a pace geared down to the very customs which the Fourteenth Amendment and implementing federal laws were designed to combat.

Cases in which delays in enforcement of rights have been granted involve totally dissimilar considerations. Such cases generally deal with the abatement of nuisances, e.g., New Jersey v. New York, 283 U. S. 473; Wisconsin v. Illinois, 278 U. S. 367; Arizona Copper Co. v. Gillespie, 230 U. S. 46; Georgia v. Tennessee Copper Co., 206 U. S. 230; or with violations of the anti-trust laws, e.g., Schine

[5] In the instant cases, dark and uncertain prophecies as to anticipated community reactions to school desegregation are speculative at best.

BLEED THROUGH

Chain Theaters v. United States, 334 U. S. 110; United States v. National Lead Co., 332 U. S. 319; United States v. Crescent Amusement Co., 323 U. S. 173; Hartford-Empire Co. v. United States, 323 U. S. 386; United States v. American Tobacco Co., 221 U. S. 106; Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey v. United States, 221 U. S. 1.

These cases are readily distinguishable, and are not precedents for the postponement of relief here. In the nuisance cases, the Court allowed the offending parties time to comply because the granting of immediate relief would have caused great injury to the public or to the defendants with comparatively slight benefit to the plaintiffs. In the instant cases, a continuation of the unconstitutional practice is as injurious to the welfare of our government as it is to the individual appellants.

In the anti-trust cases, delay could be granted without violence to individual rights simply because there were no individual rights on the plaintiff's side. The suits were brought by the Government and the only interest which could have been prejudiced by the delays granted is the diffuse public interest in free competition. The delays granted in anti-trust cases rarely, if ever, permit the continuance of active wrongful conduct, but merely give time for dissolution and dissipation of the effects of past misconduct. Obviously, these cases have nothing to do with ours.

It should be remembered that the rights involved in these cases are not only of importance to appellants and the class they represent, but are among the most important in our society. As this Court said on May 17th:

> Today, education is perhaps the most important function of state and local governments. Compulsory school attendance laws and the great expenditures for education both demonstrate our > recognition of the importance of education to our democratic society. It is required in the performance of our most basic public responsibilities, even service in the armed forces. It is the very foundation of good citizenship. Today it is a principal instrument in awakening the child to cultural values, in preparing him for later professional training, and in helping him to adjust normally to his environment. In these days, it is doubtful that any child may reasonably be expected to succeed in life if he is denied the opportunity of an education. Such an opportunity, where the state has undertaken to provide it, is a right which must be made available to all on equal terms.

Neither the nuisance cases nor the anti-trust cases afford any support for delay in these cases. On the contrary, in cases more nearly analogous to the instant cases, this Court has held that the executive branch of the government could not justify the detention of wrongfully seized private property on the basis of a national economic crisis in the midst of the Korean conflict. Nor could the War Relocation Authority wrongfully detain a loyal American because of racial tension or threats of disorder. It follows that in these cases this Court should apply similar limitations to the judiciary in the exercise of its equity power when a request is made that it delay enjoyment of personal rights on grounds of alleged expediency.

B. Empirical Data Negate Unsupported Speculations That a Gradual Decree Would Bring About a More Effective Adjustment.

Obviously, we are not aware of what appellees will advance on further argument as reasons for postponing the enforcement of the rights here involved. Therefore, the only way we can discuss Question 4(b) is by conjecture in so far as reasons for postponement are concerned.

BLEED THROUGH

There is no basis for the assumption that gradual as opposed to immediate desegregation is the better, smoother or more "effective" mode of transition. On the contrary, there is an impressive body of evidence which supports the position that gradualism, far from facilitating the process, may actually make it more difficult; that, in fact, the problems of transition will be a good deal less complicated than might be forecast by appellees. Our submission is that this, like many wrongs, can be easiest and best undone, not by "tapering off" but by forthright action.

There is now substantial documented experience with desegregation in this country, in schools and elsewhere.[6] On the basis of this experience, it is possible to estimate with some accuracy the chances of various types of "gradual" plans for success in minimizing trouble during the period of transition.

Some plans have been tried involving a set "deadline" without the specification of intervening steps to be taken. Where such plans have been tried, the tendency seems to have been to regard the deadline as the time when action is to be initiated rather than the time at which desegregation is to be accomplished. Since there exists no body of knowledge that is even helpful in selecting an optimum time at the end of which the situation may be expected to be better, the deadline date is necessarily arbitrary and hence may be needlessly remote.[7]

A species of the "deadline" type of plan attempts to prepare the public, through churches, radio and other agencies, for the impending change. It is altogether conjectural how successful such attempts might be in actually effecting change in attitude. The underlying assumption—that change in attitude must precede change in action—is itself at best a highly questionable one. There is a considerable body of evidence to indicate that attitude may itself be influenced by situation [8] and that, where the situation demands that an individual act as if he were not prejudiced, he will so act, despite the continuance, at least temporarily, of the prejudice.[9] We submit that this Court can itself contribute to an effective and decisive change in attitude by insistence that the present unlawful situation be changed forthwith.

As to any sort of "deadline" plan, even assuming that community leaders make every effort to build community support for desegregation, experience shows that other forces in the community will use the time allowed to firm 17th decision cannot be effective without the support of a forthwith decree from this Court.

Besides the "deadline" plans, various "piecemeal" schemes have been suggested and tried. These seem to be inspired by the assumption that it is always easier and better to do something slowly and a little at a time than to do it all at once. As might be expected, it has appeared that the resistance of some people affected by such schemes is increased since they feel arbitrarily selected as experimental animals. Other members in the community observe this reaction and in turn their anxieties are sharpened.[12]

Piecemeal desegregation of schools, on a class-by-class basis, tends to arouse feelings of the same kind [13] and these feelings are heightened by the intra-familial and intra-school differences thus created.[14] It would be hard to imagine any means better calculated to increase tension in regard to desegregation than to so arrange matters so that some children in a family were attending segregated and others unsegregated classes. Hardly more promising of harmony is the prospect of a school which is segregated in the upper parts and mixed in the lower.

When one looks at various "gradual" processes, the fact is that there is no convincing evidence which supports the theory that "gradual" desegregation is more "effec-

The progress of desegregation in the Topeka schools is an example of gradualism based upon conjecture, fears and speculation regarding community opposition which might delay completion of desegregation forever. The desegregation plan adopted by the Topeka school authorities called for school desegregation first in the better residential areas of the city and desegregation followed in those areas where the smallest number of Negro children lived. There is little excuse for the school board's not having already completed desegregation. Apparently either the fact that the school board, in order to complete the transition, may have to utilize one or more of the former schools for Negroes and assign white children to them or the fact that it must now reassign some 700 Negro children to approximately seven former all-white schools, seems to present difficulties to appellees. One must remember that in Topeka there has been complete integration above the sixth grade for many years. The schools already desegregated have reported no difficulties. There can hardly be any basic resistance to nonsegregated schools in the habits or customs of the city's populace. The elimination of the remnants of segregation throughout the city's school system should be a simple matter.

[15] ASHMORE, op. cit. supra note 6, at 80:

> Proponents of the gradual approach argue that it minimizes public resistance to integration. But some school officials who have experienced it believe the reverse is true. A markedly gradual program, they contend, particularly one which involves the continued maintenance of some separate schools, invites opposition and allows time for it to be organized. Whatever the merit of this argument, the case histories clearly indicate a tendency for local political pressure to be applied by both sides when the question of integration is raised, and when policies remain unsettled for a protracted period the pressures mount. One school board member in Arizona privately expressed the wish that the state had gone all the way and made integration mandatory instead of optional—thus giving the board something to point to as justification for its action.

No special public preparations involving teachers, parents, students or the general public were made, nor were they necessary in advance of either the first or second step in the implementation of the Board's decision to desegregate the school system. Indeed, the Board of Education adopted the second step in January, 1954, and the only reports of what was involved were those published in the newspapers. Negro parents living in these territories were not notified by appellees regarding the change, but transferred their children to the schools in question on the basis of information provided in the newspapers. As far as the teachers in those schools were concerned, they were merely informed in the Spring of 1954 that their particular schools would be integrated in September. Thus, delay here cannot be based upon need for public orientation.

It should be pointed out that of the 23 public elementary schools, there exists potential space for some additional 83 classrooms of which 16 such potential classrooms are in the four schools to which the majority of the Negroes are now assigned. No claim can be made that the school system is overcrowded and unable to absorb the Negro and white children under a reorganization plan. There is no discernable reason why all of the elementary schools of Topeka have not been desegregated.

As is pointed out in the Brief for Petitioners on Further Reargument in Bolling v. Sharpe (No. 4, October

BLEED THROUGH

Term, 1954) the gradualist approach adopted by the Board of Education in Washington, D. C., produced confusion, hardship and unnecessary delay. Indeed, the operation of the "Corning Plan" has produced manifold problems in school administration which could have been avoided if the transition had been immediate. The argument that delay is more sound educationally has been shown to be without basis in fact in the operation of the District of Columbia plan—so conclusively, in fact, that the time schedule has been accelerated. The experience in the District argues for immediate action.

To suggest that this Court may properly mold its relief so as to serve whatever theories as to educational policy may be in vogue is to confuse its function with that of a school board, and to confuse the clear-cut constitutional issue in these cases with the situation in which a school board might find itself if it were unbound by constitutional requirements and were addressing itself to the policy problem of effecting desegregation in what seems to it the most desirable way. But even if a judgment as to the abstract desirability of gradualism could be supported by evidence, it is outside the province of this Court to balance the merely desirable against the adjudicated constitutional rights of appellants. The Constitution has prescribed the educational policy applicable to the issue tendered in this case, and this Court has no power, under the guise of a "gradual" decree, to select another.

We submit that there are various necessary administrative factors which would make "immediate" relief as of tomorrow physically impossible. These include such factors as need for redistricting and the redistribution of teachers and pupils. Under the circumstances of this case, the Court's mandate will probably come down in the middle or near the close of the 1954 school term, and the decrees of the courts of first instance could not be put into effect until September, 1955. Appellees would, therefore, have had from May 17, 1954, to September, 1955, to make necessary administrative changes.

II.

Answering Question 5: If This Court Should Decide to Permit an "Effective Gradual Adjustment" from Segregated School Systems to Systems Not Based on Color Distinctions, It Should Not Formulate Detailed Decrees but Should Remand These Cases to the Courts of First Instance with Specific Directions to Complete Desegregation by a Day Certain.

In answering Question 5, we are required to assume that this Court "will exercise its equity powers to permit an effective gradual adjustment to be brought about from existing segregated systems to a system not based on color distinctions" thereby refusing to hold that appellants were entitled to decrees providing that, "within the limits set by normal geographic school districting, Negro children should forthwith be admitted to schools of their choice." While we feel most strongly that this Court will not subordinate appellants' constitutional rights to immediate relief to any plan for an "effective gradual adjustment," we must nevertheless assume the contrary for the purpose of answering Question 5.[17]

Question 5 assumes that there should be an "effective gradual adjustment" to a system of desegregated education. We have certain difficulties with this formulation. We have already demonstrated that there is no reason to believe that any form of gradualism will be more effective than forthwith compliance. If, however, this Court determines upon a gradual decree, we then urge that, as a minimum, certain safeguards must be embodied in that "gradual" decree in order to render it as nearly "effective" as any decree can be which continues the injury being suffered by these appellants as a consequence of the unconstitutional practice here complained of.

Appellants assume that "the great variety of local conditions", to which the Court referred in its May 17th opinion, embraces only such educationally relevant factors as variations in administrative organization, physical facilities, school population and pupil redistribution, and does not include such judicially non-cognizable factors as need for community preparation, Ex Parte Endo, 323 U. S. 283, and threats of racial hostility and violence, Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U. S. 60; Monk v. City of Birmingham, 185 F. 2d 859 (C. A. 5th 1950), cert. denied, 341 U. S. 940.

Further we assume that the word "effective" might be so construed that a plan contemplating desegregation after the lapse of many years could be called an "effective gradual adjustment." For, whenever the change is in fact made, it results in a desegregated system. We do not understand that this type of adjustment would be "effective" within the meaning of Question 5 nor do we undertake to answer it in this framework. Rather, we assume that under any circumstances, the question encompasses due consideration for the constitutional rights of each of these appellants and those presently in the class they represent to be free from enforced racial segregation in public education.

Ordinarily, the problem—the elimination of race as the criterion of admission to public schools—by its very nature would require only general dispositive directions by this Court. Even if the Court decides that the adjustment to nonsegregated systems is to be gradual, no elaborate decree structure is essential at this stage of the proceedings. In neither event would appellants now ask this Court, or any other court, to direct or supervise the details of operation of the local school systems. In either event, we would seek effective provisions assuring their operation—forthwith in the one instance and eventually in the other—in conformity with the Constitution.

These considerations suggest appellants' answers to Question 5. Briefly stated, this Court should not formulate detailed decrees in these cases. It should not appoint a special master to hear evidence with a view to recommending specific terms for such decrees. It should remand these cases to the courts of first instance with directions to frame decrees incorporating certain provisions, hereinafter discussed, that appellants believe are calculated to make them as nearly effective as any gradual desegregation decree can be. The courts of first instance need only follow normal procedures in arriving at such additional provisions for such decrees as circumstances may warrant.

Declaratory Provisions

This Court should reiterate in the clearest possible language that segregation in public education is a denial of the equal protection of the laws. It should order that the decrees include a recital that constitutional and statutory provisions, and administrative and judicial pronouncements, requiring or sanctioning segregated education afford no basis for the continued maintenance of segregation in public schools.

The important legal consequence of such declaratory provisions would be to obviate the real or imagined dilemma of some school officials who contend that, pending the issuance of injunctions against the continuation of segregated education in their own systems, they are entitled or even obliged to carry out state policies the invalidity of which this Court has already declared. The dilemma is well illustrated by the case of Steiner v. Simmons (Del. Sup. Ct. No. 27, 1954), pending in the Delaware Supreme Court, wherein plaintiffs are suing for readmission to Milford's high school from which, on September 30, 1954, they were expelled because they are Negroes. The Vice Chancellor granted the requested mandatory injunction, finding that plaintiffs had a constitutional right to readmission to school. The Delaware Supreme Court, however, granted a stay pending determination of the appeal on the basis of its preliminary conclusion that "there are serious questions of law touching the existence of that legal right." [18]

This Court's decision of May 17th put state authorities on notice that thereafter they could not with impunity

This Court finds the Board of School Commissioners have exercised their discretion legally and in accordance with a final and enforceable holding and decision of the Supreme Court. Those cases were undoubtedly argued before the Supreme Court fully, and the views of every division of thought of our citizenry was undoubtedly presented to the Court; but the Court has spoken. Whether the individual agrees or disagrees with the finding, he is bound thereby so long as it remains the law of the land. The Court realizes the change and the difficulty some may have accepting the reality or the inevitable from the standpoint of enforcement. We live in a country where our rights and liberties have been protected under a system of laws which has withstood the test of time. We must allow ourselves to be governed by those laws, realizing there are many differences among our people. Respect for the law is of paramount importance. The law must be accepted. We must all be forced to abide by it. We can gain nothing by demonstrations of violence except sorrow and possible destructions.

abrogate the constitutional rights of American children not to be segregated in public schools on the basis of race. This type of recital in the decree should foreclose further misunderstanding, real or pretended, of the principle of law that continuation of racial segregation in public education is in direct violation of the Constitution—state constitutions, statutes, custom or usage requiring such segregation to the contrary notwithstanding.

Time Provisions

We do not know what considerations may be presented by appellees to warrant gradualism. But whatever these considerations may be, appellants submit that any school plan embracing gradualism must safeguard against the gradual adjustment becoming an interminable one. Therefore, appellants respectfully urge that this Court's opinion and mandate also contain specific directions that any decree to be entered by a district court shall specify (1) that the process of desegregation be commenced immediately, (2) that appellees be required to file periodic reports to the courts of first instance, and (3) an outer time limit by which desegregation must be completed.

Even cases involving gradual decrees have required some amount of immediate compliance by the party under an obligation to remedy his wrongs to the extent physically possible.[19] In Wisconsin v. Illinois, 281 U. S. 179, the Court said:

> It already has been decided that the defendants are doing a wrong to the complainants, and that they must stop it. They must find out a way at their peril. We have only to consider what is possible if the state of Illinois devotes all its powers to > 1. On and after July 1, 1930,[20] the defendants, the state of Illinois and the sanitary district of Chicago are enjoined from diverting any of the waters of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence system or watershed through the Chicago drainage canal and its auxiliary channels or otherwise in excess of an annual average of 6,500 c.f.s. in addition to domestic pumpage (p. 201).

Considering the normal time consumed before the issuance of the mandate of this Court and the time for submission and preparation of decrees by the courts of first instance, decrees in these cases will not issue until after February, 1955—after the normal mid-term in most school systems. Thus, the school boards would have until September, 1955—sixteen months after the May 17th opinions—to change to a system not based on color distinctions. This time could very well be considered as necessarily incidental to any decision by this Court requiring "forthwith" decrees by the courts of first instance.

Whatever the reasons for gradualism, there is no reason to believe that the process of transition would be more effective if further extended. Certainly, to indulge school authorities until September 1, 1956, to achieve desegregation would be generous in the extreme. Therefore, we submit that if the Court decides to grant further time, then the Court should direct that all decrees specify September, 1956, as the outside date by which desegregation must be accomplished. This would afford more than a year, in excess of the time necessary for administrative changes, to review and modify decisions in the light of lessons learned as these decisions are put into effect.

[20] This opinion was rendered April 30, 1930.

We submit that the decrees should contain no provision for extension of the fixed limit, whatever date may be fixed. Such a provision would be merely an invitation to procrastinate.[21]

We further urge this Court to make it plain that the time for completion of the desegregation program will not depend upon the success or failure of interim activities. The decrees in the instant cases should accordingly provide that in the event the school authorities should for any reason fail to comply with the time limitation of the decree, Negro children should then be immediately admitted to the schools to which they apply.[22]

All states requiring segregated public education were by the May 17th decision of this Court put upon notice that segregated systems of public education are unconstitutional. A decision granting appellees time for gradual adjustment should be so framed that no other state maintaining such a system is lulled into a period of inaction and induced to merely await suit on the assumption that it will then be granted the same period of time after such suit is instituted.

S. 106, where this Court directed the allowance of a period of six months, with leave to grant an additional sixty days if necessary, for activities dissolving an illegal monopoly and recreating out of its components a new situation in harmony with the law, but further directed that if within this period a legally harmonious condition was not brought about, the lower court should give effect to the requirements of the Sherman Act.

BLEED THROUGH

Conclusion

Much of the opposition to forthwith desegregation does not truly rest on any theory that it is better to accomplish it gradually. In considerable part, if indeed not in the main, such opposition stems from a desire that desegregation not be undertaken at all. In consideration of the type of relief to be granted in any case, due consideration must be given to the character of the right to be protected. Appellants here seek effective protection for adjudicated constitutional rights which are personal and present. Consideration of a plea for delay in enforcement of such rights must be preceded by a showing of clear legal precedent therefor and some public necessity of a gravity never as yet demonstrated.

There are no applicable legal precedents justifying a plea for delay. As a matter of fact, relevant legal precedents preclude a valid plea for delay. And, an analysis of the non-legal materials relevant to the issue whether or not relief should be delayed in these cases shows that the process of gradual desegregation is at best no more effective than immediate desegregation.

WHEREFORE, we respectfully submit that this Court should direct the issuance of decrees in each of these cases requiring desegregation by no later than September of 1955.

REPLY BRIEF FOR APPELLANTS IN NOS. 1, 2 AND 3 AND FOR RESPONDENTS IN NO. 5 ON FURTHER REARGUMENT

The briefs filed on this reargument by appellees and amici curiae (with the exception of those in Nos. 1 and 5, and the brief filed on behalf of the Attorney General of The United States) are similar in substance despite some differences in details. Our reply to them can, therefore, be made in one joint brief.

ARGUMENT

Briefs Filed by Appellees and State Attorneys General Do Not Offer Any Affirmative Plan for Desegregation but Are Merely Restatements of Arguments in Favor of Interminable Continuation of Racial Segregation.

In our Brief on Further Reargument, we stated: [1]

> Much of the opposition to forthwith desegregation does not truly rest on any theory that it is better to accomplish it gradually. In considerable part, if indeed not in the main, such opposition stems from a desire that desegregation not be undertaken at all.

Similarly, the briefs filed at this time, both by appellees and state attorneys general seems to be directed against ending racial segregation in our time, rather than toward desegregation within a reasonable time. First, these briefs do not in fact offer any affirmative plan or elements of such a plan for accomplishing the task of desegregation. Secondly, and equally significant, the main reasons now proffered in support of indefinite delay are identical with arguments previously advanced for denying relief on the merits.

This Court has decided that racial segregation is unconstitutional—that it is a practice, moreover, which has such effects on its victims that it can only be described as abhorrent. Yet, in answering questions 4 and 5, propounded by the Court, the States do not even get around to what must, in the light of that decision, be the main problem underlying those questions: How can this practice be most expeditiously done away with? Reasons for delay, which would seem to occupy at best a subsidiary position, are the sole preoccupation of state counsel, and the affirmative problem gets virtually no attention.[2]

The brief of the Attorney General of Florida does contain a Point entitled "Specific Suggestions to the Court in Formulating a Decree."[3] But, the effect of the suggested plan[4] would be to subject the constitutional rights of Negro children to denial on the basis of such a variety of intangible factors that the plan itself cannot be seriously regarded as one for implementing the May 17th decision.

Each individual Negro child must, under the Florida plan, petition a court of the first instance for admission to an unsegregated school, after exhausting his administrative remedies. It is up to him to establish to that court's satisfaction that there exists no "reasonable grounds" for delay in his admission. "Reasonable grounds" include lack of a reasonable time to amend the state school laws, good faith efforts of the school board in promoting citizens' educational committees, administrative problems, and "evidence of . . . a strong degree of sincere opposition and sustained hostility" [emphasis supplied] giving the school board ground to believe that admission of the applicant would "... create emotional responses among the children which would seriously interfere with their education." In other words, the applicant's right is to be postponed until everything seems entirely propitious for granting it. It is submitted that this is not a plan for granting rights, but a plan for denying them just as long as can possibly be done without a direct overruling of the May 17th decision.

[2] It is true that Delaware and Kansas catalogue the progress they have made thus far in accomplishing integration. But both states plead for delay without offering any valid reasons therefor.

Lest there be any doubt about this, the final criterion for admission to unsegregated schooling should be quoted:[5]

> (6) Evidence that the petitioner's application was made in good faith and not for capricious reasons. Such evidence should demonstrate:
>
> (a) That the petitioner personally feels that he would be handicapped in his education, either because of lack of school plant facilities or psychological or sociological reasons if his application for admission is denied.
>
> (b) That the petitioner is not motivated in his application solely by a desire for the advancement of a racial group on economic, social or political grounds, as distinguished from his personal legal right to equality in public school education as guaranteed by the 14th Amendment. This distinction should be carefully drawn [emphasis supplied].

Where the devisers of a plan are disposed to characterize opposition to desegregation as "sincere" and reasons for desiring admission as "capricious", we cannot be surprised at a rather peculiar procedural consequence of the dispensation they set up. The "petitioner", if he is to make timely application, exhaust his administrative remedies, and allow time for appeal, will have to draw this fine distinction at about four years of age, if he is to start the first grade in a desegregated school. Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings will have to come a wisdom in self-analysis which surely has never in the history of this country been required of any applicant for relief from the denial of a personal constitutional right. The Florida Brief is no real exception to the statement that none of the States has offered any plan for actually implementing the decision of this Court.

The quality and thrust of the reasons now advanced for delay may best be evaluated by noting that (except for those that deal with purely administrative matters obviously requiring little time for solution) they are arguments which were advanced at an earlier stage in this litigation as grounds for denying relief on the merits, and now, under slightly altered guise, they walk again after their suposed laying to rest on May 17. Thus, the impossibility of procuring community acceptance of desegregation, urged earlier as a ground for decision on the merits,[6] now turns up as an argument for indefinite postponement [7] with no convincing reasons given for supposing that community attitudes will change within the segregated pattern.

The prediction that white parents will withdraw their children from public schools is repeated,[8] with the implied hope, no doubt, that at some remote date they will have attained a state of mind that will result in their leaving their children in school. "Racial tensions" are again predicted.[9] Negro teachers may lose their jobs.[10] Violence is warned of.[11] The people and the legislature will abolish the school system or decline to appropriate money for its support.[12]

All these are serious matters, but we have elsewhere shown solid reason for believing that those dire predictions, one and all, are unreliable. There is no reason for supposing that delay can minimize whatever unpleasant consequences might follow from the eradication of this great evil. Here, however, the point is that, where these arguments are resuscitated as grounds for delay, the inference is that their sponsors favor delay as long as present conditions prevail—that, in other words, they now want to delay desegregation just as long as the conditions exist which they formerly regarded as sufficient grounds for imposing segregation as a matter of legal right. The distinction is too fine to make such practical difference, either to the Negro child who is growing up or to this Court.

That it is opposition to the principle of the May 17th decision that animates these briefs is made clear by noting that the equality of schools, Plessy style, is now being urged as a ground for delay.[13] Nothing could make it clearer, moreover, that many responsible officials, taking a realistic view, will not regard the "separate but equal" doctrine as abolished until this Court orders its abandonment in practice. Most significant here is the amicus curiae brief of the Attorney General of Texas which, after making a straight-out Plessy argument, continues with the statement: "However, if the occasion arises whereby we are compelled to abolish segregation in Texas, it should be a gradual adjustment in view of the complexities of the problem" (p. 4).

Opinion Polls Are Immaterial to the Issues Herein and Do Not Afford Any Basis to Support An Argument that a Gradual Adjustment Would Be More Effective.

Several of the briefs filed herein refer to polls of public opinion in their respective States in support of arguments to postpone desegregation indefinitely.[14] These polls appear to have been made for the purpose of sampling opinions of various groups within the State as to whether they approved of the May 17th decision and whether they thought it could be enforced immediately without friction.

The information as to racial hostility obtained from these polls is indecisive of the issues before this Court. In Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U. S. 60, 80, this Court stated:

> That there exists a serious and difficult problem arising from a feeling of race hostility which the law is powerless to control, and to which it must give a measure of consideration, may be freely admitted. But its solution cannot be promoted by depriving citizens of their constitutional rights and privileges.

[14] Texas Brief, pp. 16-17; Virginia Brief pp. 13-14; North Carolina Brief pp. 7-9; Florida Brief pp. 23-24, 105 ff; Delaware Brief p. 12.

We believe the same answer should be given to any suggestion that the enforcement of constitutional rights be deferred to a time when it will have uniform public acceptance.

Even if relevant, results of polls are often not conclusive. For example, the Florida survey polled eleven "leadership" groups. These groups give evidence of a very high degree of "willingness" to comply. Although peace officers are greatly opposed to desegregation (Table 3, p. 138), only two of the eleven groups would not positively comply, and in those cases there is a very even division (Table 4, p. 139). Overall, six of the eleven groups are not opposed to the decision (Table 3, p. 138); 84.5% of white principals and supervisors who, would be charged with the duty of implementation, would comply (Table 4, p. 139). A majority of all groups expect neither mob violence nor "serious violence" (Table 5, p. 140).

Moreover, such polls are not a valid index of how the individuals questioned will in fact act in the event of desegregation. Modern psychological research shows that, especially in the case of broad public issues, many persons simply "do not follow through even on actions which they say they personally will take in support of an opinion."[15]

BLEED THROUGH

The Attorney General of Texas sets out in his brief in these cases a survey by the "Texas Poll" showing 71% disapproval of the May 17th decision and 65% approval of continued segregation notwithstanding this Court's decision. It is interesting to note that in Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629, respondents included in their brief a survey made by the same "Texas Poll" showing that 76% of all Texans were "against Negroes and whites going to the same universities." However, this Court ordered Sweatt admitted to the University of Texas. He and other Negroes attended the University.[16] Since then Negroes have been admitted to and are attending this and other public universities in twelve southern States.[16a]

Finally, there is nothing to indicate that an extended delay in ordering the elimination of all segregation will improve public attitudes or eliminate the objections presently interposed. Clearly the polls are irrelevant and should be so treated by this Court.

---

[16] It is also significant that many municipal junior colleges in Texas have also desegregated their student bodies. See SOUTHERN SCHOOL NEWS, October 1, 1954, p. 13, c. 5.

[16a] JOHNSON, "PUBLIC HIGHER EDUCATION IN THE SOUTH", 23 JOURNAL OF NEGRO EDUCATION 317 (1954), especially at 328 where Dr. Johnson, University of North Carolina Sociologist, concludes:

> The transition from complete segregation to some degree of integration of Negroes into the publicly-supported institutions of higher learning in the South has already been accomplished in all except five of the Southern states, and most of this change has occurred in the brief period, 1948-1953. Despite numerous predictions of violence, this transition has been accomplished without a single serious incident of interracial friction.

The Wide Applicability of the Decision in These Cases Should Not Affect the Relief to Which Appellants Are Entitled.

Effort is made throughout the briefs for appellees and the several attorneys general to balance the personal and present rights here involved against the large number of children of both races now attending public school on a segregated basis. This argument is made for a twofold purpose: to escape the uniformity of decisions of this Court on the personal character of the rights involved and, secondly, to destroy the present character of the right involved.

Of course, the decision of this Court in the instant cases will have wide effect involving public school systems of many states and many public school children. The mere fact of numbers involved is not sufficient to delay enforcement of rights of the type here involved.[17]

On the face of it, their position is both ill-taken and self-defeating. That it is ill-taken becomes clear when the suggestion itself is clearly stated; obviously, there is nothing in mere numerousness as such which has any tendency whatever to create or destroy rights to efficacious legal relief. Behind every numeral is a Negro child, suffering the effects spoken of by the Court on May 17. It is a manifest inconsequence to say that the rights or remedial needs of each child are diminished merely because others

[17] We put to one side as obviously immaterial the mere technical character of these suits as class actions under Rule 23(a)(3). Obviously, the mere joinder of plaintiffs in a spurious class suit for reasons of convenience cannot have any effect on the nature of the rights asserted or on the availability of normal relief remedy. Whether a suit is or is not a class action tells us little, in this field of law, as to the magnitude of the interests involved; Sweatt v. Painter was an individual mandamus suit, but the effect of that decision spread throughout the segregating states.

BLEED THROUGH

are in the same position. That this argument is self-defeating emerges when it is considered that its tendency is simply to establish that we have to do with an evil affecting a great many people; presumably, the abolition of a widespread evil is even more urgent than dealing with isolated cases of wrongdoing.

This Court has consistently treated the personal rights of litigants on a personal basis. Every leading case involving discrimination against Negroes has necessarily and demonstrably involved large numbers of people; yet this Court has given present relief on a personal basis to those who showed themselves entitled to it, without any hint of the possibility that the rights of citizenship are diminished because many people are being denied them. The Sweatt, Sipuel and McLaurin cases and Smith v. Allwright, all, as was well known to this Court and to the country, involved not merely the individuals or class-plaintiffs or geographical subdivision actually before the Court, but also the whole framework of law school, graduate school or primary election segregation. All major constitutional cases involve large numbers of people. Yet there is not a hint, in words or in action, in any past case, to the effect that the wide applicability of a decision was considered material to the right to relief. It is unthinkable that this Court would apply any such doctrine to limit the enjoyment of constitutional rights in general; there is no reason for its making a special and anomalous exception of the case at bar.

Actually, to point to the vast numbers of people whose lives will be affected by the relief granted here is only a diffuse way of raising all the questions as to the consequences of immediate desegregation. We have dealt with these questions elsewhere. The suggestion that mere numerousness makes a difference adds nothing new, but merely serves to confuse the issues by diverting attention from the extremely personal plight of each child, and from his need for present relief.

Average Differences in Student Groups Have No Relevance to the Individual Rights of Pupils: Individual Differences Can Be Handled Administratively Without Reference to Race.

Having attempted to subordinate appellants' personal and present constitutional rights to an alleged overriding consideration of the large numbers of people involved, these briefs for appellees then seek to further limit the individual rights of Negro students by broad characterizations of group intelligence, group morality and health.[18] Specifically, it is pointed out that statistics show that on the average Negro children in segregated schools score lower on achievement tests and are in general more retarded culturally than white children. This data, contrary to the conclusions advanced thereupon, merely underscores and further documents the finding quoted in this Court's opinion:

> "Segregation of white and colored children in public schools has a detrimental effect upon the colored children. The impact is greater when it has the sanction of the law; for the policy of separating the races is usually interpreted as denoting the inferiority of the Negro group. A sense of inferiority affects the motivation of a child to learn. Segregation with the sanction of law, therefore, has a tendency to [retard] the educational and mental development of Negro children and to deprive them of some of the benefits they would receive in a racial[ly] integrated school system."

We have come too far not to realize that educability and absorption and adoption of cultural values has nothing to do with race. What is achieved educationally and culturally, we now know to be largely the result of opportunity and environment.[19] That the Negro is so disadvantaged educationally and culturally in the states where segregation is required is the strongest argument against its continuation for any period of time. Yet those who use this argument as a basis for interminable delay in the elimination of segregation in reality are seeking to utilize the product of their own wrongdoing as a justification for continued malfeasance.

Our public school systems have grown and improved as an American institution. And in every community it is obvious that children of all levels of culture, educability, and achievement must be accounted for within the same system. In some school systems the exceptional children are separated from the rest of the children. In others there are special classes for retarded children, for slow readers and for the physically handicapped. But these factors have no relation to race. These are administrative problems with respect to conduct of the public school.

In the past, large city school systems, North and South, have had the problem of absorbing children from rural areas where the public schools and cultural backgrounds were below the city standards. On many occasions these migrations have been very sudden and in proportionately very large numbers. This problem has always been solved as an administrative detail. It has never been either insurmountable or has it been used as an excuse to force the rural children to attend sub-standard schools. Similarly, large cities have met without difficulty the influx of immigrants from foreign countries.

Cultural and health standards have always been maintained in public schools and there could be no objection to the continuation of such standards without regard to race. All social scientists seem to be in agreement that race and color have no connection whatsoever with a student's ability to be educated. Achievement and cultural deficiencies are nonracial in character, also. Hence these factors in no wise relate to questions posed as to whether desegregation should take place immediately or over an extended period.

Perhaps the main reasons for rejecting appellees' argument are that the conditions they complain of can never be remedied as long as segregation in public schools is continued and these so-called problems, i.e., average on achievement tests, health, etc., are administrative problems which can be solved by recognized administrative regulations made to fit the problems without regard to pigmentation of the skin. It is significant that appellees and the Attorneys-General who advance these arguments do not give any hope to anyone that the continuation of segregated public education will ever remove these problems which are the product of this segregation.

On the other hand, appellants have shown in their Brief on Further Reargument that on the basis of substantial documented experience: "There is no basis for the assumption that gradual as opposed to immediate desegregation is the better, smoother or more 'effective' mode of transition. On the contrary, there is an impressive body of evidence which supports the position that gradualism, far from facilitating the process, may actually make it more difficult; that, in fact, the problems of transition will be a good deal less complicated than might be forecast by appellees. Our submission is that this, like many wrongs, can be easiest and best undone, not by 'tapering off' but by forthright action" (p. 31).

Official Reactions in States Affected by the May 17th Decision Make it Plain that Delay Will Detract From Rather Than Contribute to the "Effectiveness" of the Transition to Desegregated Schools.

Events occurring in the states affected by the decision of May 17, 1954, do not support the suggestions of appellees and amici curiae that further (and limitless) postponement of relief to Negro children will assure an "effective" adjustment from segregated to non-segregated school systems. In terms of legislative, executive or administrative reaction, the southern and border states may now be grouped in three loose categories:

(1) Those which have not waited for further directions from the Court, but have undertaken desegregation in varied measure during the current school year. Typical of the states falling in this category are Delaware,[20] Kansas,[21] Missouri,[22] and West Virginia.[23] Although not a state, the District of Columbia would fall within this group.

(2) Those which have decided to await a decision on the question of relief but have indicated an intention to

(3) Those which have indicated an intention to circumvent the decision of this Court or interminably delay the enjoyment by Negro children of their constitutionally protected rights not to be segregated in public schools. Included in this category are states like South Carolina[27] and Mississippi,[28] which have enacted legislation designed to nullify any decision of this Court in these cases, and states like Virginia[29] and Florida,[30] where either the governors or special legislative committees studying the problem have recommended that "every legal means" be used to preserve segregated school systems.[31]

Against this background of state reaction to the decision of May 17, 1954, it is clear that postponement of relief will serve no purpose. The states in the first category have already begun to implement this Court's decision and any delay as to them may imperil the progress already made.[32] The states in the second category have indicated a willingness to do whatever this Court directs and there is certainly no reason for delay as to them. The probable effect of delay, as to states in the third category, must be evaluated in the light of their declared intentions; we are justified in assuming that it would have no affirmative effect, but would merely provide additional time to devise and put into practice schemes expressly designed to thwart this Court's decision.

Conclusion

Appellants recognize that the problems confronting this Court, as it turns to the implementation of its decision in these cases, are of primary magnitude. Their high seriousness is enhanced by the fact that sovereign states are in effect, though not formally, at the bar and that the evil to which the Court's decree must be directed is no transitory wrong but is of the essence of the social structure of a great section of our nation.

Yet, it should be borne in mind that the very magnitude of these problems exists because of the assumption, tacitly indulged up to now, that the Constitution is not to be applied in its full force and scope to all sections of this country alike, but rather that its guarantees are to be enjoyed, in one part of our nation, only as molded and modified by the desire and customs of the dominant component of the sectional population. Such a view, however expressed, ignores the minimum requirement for a truly national constitution. It ignores also a vast part of the reality of the sectional interest involved, for that interest must be composed of the legitimate aspirations of Negroes as well as whites. It certainly ignores the repercussions which any reluctance to forthrightly enforce appellants' rights would have on this nation's international relations. Every day of delay means that this country is failing to develop its full strength.

The time has come to end the division of one nation into those sections where the Constitution is and those where it is not fully respected. Only by forthright action can the country set on the road to a uniform amenability to its Constitution. Finally, the right asserted by these appellants is not the only one at stake. The fate of other great constitutional freedoms, whether secured by the Fourteenth Amendment or by other provisions, is inevitably bound up in the resolution to be made in these cases. For delay in enforcement of these rights invites the insidious prospect that a moratorium may equally be placed on the enjoyment of other constitutional rights.

In disposing of the great issues before it, this Court should do no less than order the abolition of racial segregation in public education by a day certain, as heretofore set forth in Appellants' Brief on Further Reargument.

MEMORANDUM BRIEF FOR APPELLANTS IN NOS. 1, 2 AND 3 AND FOR RESPONDENTS IN NO. 5 ON FURTHER REARGUMENT WITH RESPECT TO THE EFFECT OF THE COURT'S DECREE

Preliminary Statement

During oral argument question was raised concerning the class suit aspect of these cases—the extent of the class and effect of a decree on members of the class not before the Court. The Court then requested appellants to file this memorandum.

I

These Are Spurious Class Suits As Defined by Rule 23a(3) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

The complaint in each of the cases was filed by a number of Negro public school pupils enrolled in a local public school system and their parents or guardians, on behalf of themselves and an untold number of unnamed persons "similarly situated". The defendants in all of the cases were local public school authorities, i.e., the local boards of education where they were incorporated bodies, the members of local school boards and local superintendents of schools. The gravamen of every complaint was that the defendants had operated and maintained the local public school system under their control and supervision on a racially segregated basis pursuant to state constitutional and/or statutory provisions; that defendants had denied both the named and unnamed minor Negro children admission to public schools set apart for white children, solely on the grounds of race or color; that both the named and unnamed minor Negro children had suffered discriminatory treatment and had been irreparably damaged thereby; and that as a result of this the named plaintiffs and all others similarly situated had been denied rights protected under the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution. The relief sought was a declaratory judgment which decreed the unconstitutionality of the state policy authorizing racially segregated schools plus an injunction restraining defendants from enforcing such legislation and from making any distinction based on race or color among children attending local public schools.

BLEED THROUGH

In view of the foregoing summary of the complaints, it is clear that there is in each case a specification of the essentials of the third or "spurious" type of class suit defined in Rule 23(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.[1]

In Briggs v. Elliot, the class represented includes all Negro children within the statutory age limits eligible to attend public schools and in fact attending such schools in School District No. 22 and the Summerton High School District (parts of which now form School District No. 1), Clarendon County, South Carolina (R. 4-5).[2] It also

---

[1] Rule 23 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure provides as follows:

(a) Representation. If persons constituting a class are so numerous as to make it impracticable to bring them all before the Court, such of them, one or more, as will fairly insure the adequate representation of all may, on behalf of all, sue or be sued, when the character of the right sought to be enforced for or against the class is

(1) joint, or common, or secondary in the sense that the owner of a primary right refuses to enforce that right and a member of the class thereby becomes entitled to enforce it;

(2) several, and the object of the action is the adjudication of claims which do or may affect specific property involved in the action; or

(3) several, and there is a common question of law or fact affecting the several rights and a common relief is sought.

[2] The class as named in the complaint includes all the Negro children of school age in South Carolina. Obviously the class could only be that broad if the Court had before it a defendant with responsibility for all the State's public schools. Since these defendants' responsibilities are not that extensive, the class cannot be inclusive as the terms of the complaint.

includes their parents or guardians (R. 5); and both minor and adult members of the class are citizens of the United States and of the State of South Carolina and residents of Clarendon County. At the time of trial there were 959 minor members of the class (R. 50). During the recent oral argument before this Court, counsel for appellees reported that approximately 280 members of the class remain today (because of the redistricting in Clarendon County).

The class represented in Davis v. County School Board of Prince Edward County, Virginia, includes all Negroes within the statutory age limits to attend the public secondary schools of the Prince Edward County who possess the qualifications and satisfy all requirements for admission thereto (R. 9). Furthermore, the class here, as in the above suit, includes the parents or guardians of these children (R. 9); and all members are residents of Prince Edward County as well as citizens of the United States and the State of Virginia. The number of Negro children in the class was 450 at the time of trial (R. 81, 123), and the identical figure was given on reargument for the current population of the class.

In sum, the class represented in each case includes all Negro children attending or qualified to attend public schools in the local public school systems operated, maintained and controlled by the defendants.[3]

---

[3] While the legal considerations are the same in both the Kansas and Delaware cases, we see no need to discuss these cases in this regard since all members of the class have been recognized by school authorities in those cases as entitled to benefit from adoption of a policy of school desegregation.

Decrees Should Embrace Unnamed Members of the Class So They May Benefit Therefrom Without the Necessity of Bringing Individual Suits.

This Court has faced the specific question of the effect of judgment in a spurious class suit in only one case, Hansberry v. Lee, 311 U. S. 32. There the question presented was whether absentee members of a class who appeared to be represented in a prior suit were bound by a judgment adverse to the interests they asserted in the second suit. The Court, reversing the Illinois Supreme Court, ruled that the state court's decision offended due process when it held that absentee members of a class were bound by a decision in a prior suit. This Court's ruling was based upon the fact that members of the class clearly had conflicting interests; and its conclusion was that where the first action was brought by some members of the class representing a single interest, other members were inadequately represented and could not, within the limits of due process, be bound by the decision. The Court did not indicate that in other circumstances, where representation was adequate, members of the class would not be bound by an adverse decision. In fact, the Court said at pp. 42-43:

> It is a familiar doctrine of the federal courts that members of a class not present as parties to the litigation may be bound by the judgment where they are in fact adequately represented by parties who are present, . . . or where for any other reason the relationship between the parties present and those who are absent is such as legally to entitle the former to stand in judgment for the latter.

Subsequently, federal courts have construed the decision in Hansberry v. Lee to mean, as applied to all spurious class suits, that all members of the class whose interests are in accord with those of the plaintiff in the original action will be bound by an adverse decision. Weeks v. Bareco Oil Co., 125 F. 2d 84 (C. A. 7th 1941). Cf. Kentucky Home Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Duling, 190 F. 2d 797, 802 (C. A. 6th 1951). Thus, there is some indication that, absent exceptional circumstances which raise questions of due process, members of a class will be bound by an adverse decision.

But even if it be assumed that unnamed members of a class are not bound by an adverse decision in the prior class action, it does not follow that such members may not avail themselves of the benefits of a favorable decision in that suit. A substantial argument may be made that members of a class should in no case be bound by an adverse decision in which they did not participate, because they have not had their day in court. But no comparable argument can be made for denying to members of a class the benefits of a decision in favor of the class. For defendant has had his day in court and he has lost. Knowing that the suit was a class action, defendant has been put on notice to defend to the hilt, and he has no more reason to relitigate the controversy against absentee members than he has to do so against the immediate plaintiff. To allow all members of the class to share in the benefits of the judgment would work no prejudice to the defendant; rather it would save him a multiplicity of separate suits. See Kalven and Rosenfeld, The Contemporary Function of the Class Suit, 8 U. of Chi. L. R. 684, 713 (1941).

The question of the effect of a judgment has been litigated infrequently, for in many spurious class actions, especially those where injunctive and declaratory relief was sought, the benefits of such a decision automatically inured to all of the members of the class and nothing further was necessary to enforce their rights. Supp. 769, 771, 772, (S. D. Cal. 1944) (public recreation cases).

Where the question has been litigated, however, it has been held that those entitled to benefits were all who were members of the class at time of entry of final judgment. National Hairdressers and Cosmetologists Association, Inc. v. Philad Co., 41 F. Supp. 701 (D. Del. 1941), aff'd, 129

F. 2d 1020. Other federal courts in spurious class suits have allowed members of the class to participate in the fruits of a favorable decision by intervention after the decree has been rendered, or have indicated that intervention at this time would be the proper procedure. York v. Guaranty Trust Co. of New York, 143 F. 2d 503 (C. A. 2nd 1944), rev'd on other grounds, 326 U. S. 99; Speed v. Transamerica Corp., 100 F. Supp. 461 (D. Del. 1951); Wilson v. City of Paducah, 100 F. Supp. 116 (W. D. The court in York v. Guaranty Trust Co. of New York, supra, at page 529 approached the problem in practical and reasonable terms, saying:

> Since, any suit under clause (3), a judgment will not be res judicata for or against those of the class who do not intervene, we suggest that if, after trial, the court finds against the defendant, appropriate steps be taken to notify all such note holders [other members of the class] to intervene (if they have not theretofore done so), judgment to be entered in favor only of those who do so within a reasonable time.

Moreover, still other federal courts have by way of dicta regarded a judgment in a spurious class action as benefiting all members of the class. Weeks v. Bareco Oil Co., 125 F. 2d 84, 91 (C. A. 7th 1941); Pennsylvania R. Co. v. United States, 111 F. Supp. 80, 90 (D. N. J. 1953); Pacific Fire Ins. Co. v. Reiner, 45 F. Supp. 703 (E. D. La. 1942). See also System Federation No. 91 v. Reed, 180 F. 2d 991 (C. A. 6th 1950), where the court by means of a strained construction of the character of the right enforced in a prior proceeding concluded that that suit was a "true" rather than a "spurious" class suit and sustained a contempt proceedings instituted by an absentee member of the class on whose behalf the named plaintiffs had won a judgment enforcing seniority and promotional rights protected under the Railway Labor Act, 45 U. S. C. § 151 et seq.

Apart from these case authorities, the extention of the fruits of a favorable decree to unnamed members of the class would appear to follow from the mere existence of Rule 23(a)(3). If the rule were otherwise, what is denoted as a "spurious" class suit under Rule 23(a) would not be a class suit at all, but merely a device for permissive joinder. This is hardly a credible construction, for permissive joinder is amply provided for by Rule 20 of the Federal Rules. See Comment, 42 Ill. L. R. 518, 523-524 (1947); Kalven and Rosenfeld, supra, 8 U. of Chi. L. R. at 699. One commentator who contends that a "spurious" class suit is really only a permissive joinder device, attempts to explain its inclusion in the Federal Rules by suggesting that it also enlarged federal jurisdiction by permitting the intervention of parties who do not meet federal jurisdictional requirements. 3 Moore's Federal Practice 3448 (2nd ed. 1948.) But, apart from the fact that this would be a rather curious approach to enlarging federal jurisdiction, Rule 82 of the Federal Rules specifically states that the Rules shall not be construed to extend federal jurisdiction.

Logic does not support any interpretation which would emasculate the operation of Rule 23(a)(3). The rule provides for a situation where the "parties are too numerous" to be brought before the court. But if all in the class must become parties of record before trial if they are to share in the judgment, the rule is reduced to saying that where it is impracticable to bring all the parties before the court, they must still all be brought before the court. In this connection it should be noted that Rule 23(c) provides that no class suit defined in 23(a) may be dismissed or compromised without the approval of the court. There would be no need for such a provision if it were not contemplated that there would be absentee members who require protection because they would be affected by the decision. Finally, as previously noted, no policy can be advanced to support such a strained construction of the Rule. A defendant, to resist participation by members of the class cannot claim that he is not liable to them, but only that they should endure the inconvenience of bringing a separate suit. Defendant is reduced to the claim that justice has been made too convenient and too complete. See Kalven and Rosenfeld, supra, 8 U. of Chi. L. R. at 699-701.

Conclusion

As pointed out in the recent arguments before this Court, these are spurious class suits under subsection (3) of Rule 23(a). They were treated as class actions by the courts below and they were described as such in this Court's opinion in Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U. S. 483.

The foregoing considerations also establish that the class which the individual plaintiffs brought on behalf of themselves and others similarly situated is precisely defined as to its racial, educational, residential and familial characteristics, as to the declaratory and injunctive relief sought, and as to the nature of the right asserted. Defendants have had their day in court and there is no equitable consideration which would justify any further litigation with the members of the class who were not individually named. Moreover, there is ample support in both case authority and logic for the issuance of a judgment or decree which will be beneficial to all members of the class involved in the individual cases.

The Negro children before the Court in these cases are entitled to public education on a non-segregated basis. The only way the relief can be meaningful to them is to abolish the policy of using race as a criterion for assignment of students. Thus, the only effective decree would be one which will enjoin the use of race in the assignment of any pupils in the school districts involved.

Therefore, we submit that this Court should enter a decree which will order the defendants to cease the conduct held unlawful in Brown v. Board of Education, supra, and which will command them to discontinue use of race or color as a criterion for admission of students. Indeed, this is the only way that the rights of even the named plaintiffs can be protected.

APPENDIX

For the convenience of the Court, we are setting out in this appendix our suggestions as to the form of decree to be entered in these cases.

Form of Decree Suggested By Appellants

Judgment reversed and cause remanded to the District Court for proceedings not inconsistent with this Court's opinion, and entry of a decree containing the following provisions:

(1) Article XI, section 7, of the Constitution of South Carolina, and section 5377 of the Code of Laws of South Carolina of 1942, and other legislative provisions of South Carolina requiring, directing or permitting defendants to maintain racial segregation in public schools in School District No. 1 of Clarendon County, South Carolina, are unconstitutional and of no force and effect;

(2) Defendants, their successors in office and their agents, employees and all other persons acting under their direction and supervision, are forthwith ordered to cease using race as a basis of determining admission, assignment or attendance in public schools in School District No. 1 of Clarendon County, South Carolina, so that at a time no later than the school term commencing in September, 1955, plaintiffs, and all others similarly situated, will be attending schools on a basis not involving race;

(3) Defendants are ordered to file with the District Court by July 15, 1955, for approval by August 15, 1955, a plan showing what changes they have made in the existing method of determining the public schools pupils attend so that race no longer will be used as a criterion;

(4) The District Court is to retain jurisdiction to make whatever further orders it deems appropriate to carry out the foregoing.

Suggested Decree to Be Entered if the Supreme Court Decides It Should Exercise Its Equity Powers to Permit An Effective Gradual Adjustment To Be Brought About From Existing Segregated Systems To Systems Not Based On Color Distinctions

Judgment reversed and cause remanded to the District Court for proceedings not inconsistent with this Court's opinion, and the entry of a decree containing the following provisions:

(1) Article XI, section 7, of the Constitution of South Carolina and section 5377 of the Code of Laws of South Carolina of 1942 and other legislative provisions of South Carolina requiring, directing or permitting defendants to maintain racial segregation in public schools in School District No. 1 in Clarendon County, South Carolina are unconstitutional and of no force and effect;

(2) Defendants, their agents, employees, successors in office and all other persons acting under their direction and supervision are forthwith ordered to cease using race as a basis of determining admission, assignment and attendance in public schools in School District No. 1, Clarendon County, South Carolina so that beginning the next school term, (i.e. September, 1955) plaintiffs and all others similarly situated will be attending school on a basis not involving race;

BLEED THROUGH

(3) Notwithstanding the foregoing if the defendants or other responsible officials by August 15, 1955,

(a) show the District Court that the transition to a school system not based on race or color distinctions involves such administrative factors as would cause serious and substantial dislocation in the operation of public schools should admission beginning the next school term be ordered; and

(b) submit a plan which, after public hearing, the District Court finds

> (i) will eliminate as soon as feasible but in no event later than September 1, 1956, racial segregation in the public schools presently subject to defendants' authority or control, in School District No. 1, Clarendon County, South Carolina; and
>
> (ii) will provide for an effective commencement of the actual transition (i.e., the admission of some Negroes to non-segregated schools) by the beginning of the next school term (September 1, 1955), the District Court may allow defendants additional time and make such orders as are necessary to permit the effectuation of such a program.

(4) Defendants are ordered to make detailed periodic reports showing the progress made in carrying out the approved plan;

(5) The District Court under no circumstances will extend the time to effect actual transition to a school system not based on race or color distinctions beyond September, 1956.

BOARD OF EDUCATION OF TOPEKA, SHAWNEE COUNTY, KANSAS, et al., Appellees.

Appeal from the United States District Court for the District of Kansas

BRIEF FOR APPELLEES

I

PRELIMINARY STATEMENT

The issue presented by this case is whether the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States is violated by a statute which permits boards of education in designated cities to maintain separate elementary school facilities for the education of white and colored children.

At the outset, counsel for the appellees desire to state that by appearing herein they do not propose to advocate the policy of segregation of any racial group within the public school system. We contend only that policy determinations are matters within the exclusive province of the legislature. We do not express an opinion as to whether the practice of having separate schools of equal facility for the white and colored races is economically expedient or sociologically desirable, or whether it is consistent with sound ethical or religious theory. We do not understand that these extra-legal questions are now before the Court. The only proposition that we desire to urge is that the Kansas statute which permits racial segregation in elementary public schools in certain cities of the state does not violate the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States as that amendment has been interpreted and applied by this Court.

OPINION BELOW

The opinion of the three-judge District Court below: (R-238-244) is reported at 98 Fed. Supp. 797.

BLEED THROUGH

III
JURISDICTION

The judgment of the court below was entered on August 3, 1951 (R. 247). On October 1, 1951, appellants filed a petition for appeal (R. 248), and an order allowing the appeal was entered (R. 251). Probable jurisdiction was noted on June 9, 1952 (R. 254). Jurisdiction of this Court rests on Title 28 U. S. C. Sec. 1253 and 2201 (b).

IV
QUESTIONS PRESENTED

1. Does a statute which permits but does not require cities of more than 15,000 population to maintain separate school facilities for colored and white students, violate the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States in a situation where a court has specifically found that there is no discrimination or distinction in physical facilities, educational qualifications of teachers, curricula or transportation facilities?

2. Is a general finding of the trial court that segregation is detrimental to colored children and deprives them of some benefits they would receive in a racial integrated school sufficient to entitle the individual colored plaintiffs to an injunction prohibiting the maintenance of an existing system of segregated schools, and to require reversal of a judgment denying such relief?

V

THE STATUTE

The statute under attack in the present litigation is section 72-1724, General Statutes of Kansas of 1949, which is quoted hereafter:

> "Powers of board; separate schools for white and colored children; manual training. The board of education shall have power to elect their own officers, make all necessary rules for the government of the schools of such city under its charge and control and of the board, subject to the provisions of this act and the laws of this state; to organize and maintain separate schools for the education of white and colored children, including the high schools in Kansas City, Kansas; no discrimination on account of color shall be made in high schools, except as provided herein; to exercise the sole control over the public schools and school property of such city; and shall have the power to establish a high school or high schools in connection with manual training and instruction or otherwise, and to maintain the same as a part of the public school system of said city."

VI

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

The appellants here, who are plaintiffs below, are Negro citizens of the United States and the State of Kansas, who reside in Topeka, Shawnee County, Kansas. The infant plaintiffs are children of common school age. The defendants below and appellees herein are the duly constituted governing body and certain administrative officers of the public school system of Topek Kansas. The State of Kansas has intervened in the District Court to defend the constitutionality of the state statute under attack.

BLEED THROUGH

Acting pursuant to the authority conferred by G. S. 1949, 72-1724, supra, the appellee, Board of Education, many years ago created within the city of Topeka, which is one school district, eighteen school areas, and now maintains in each of said areas a kindergarten and elementary school for white children only. (R. 24.) At the same time the present Board of Education of Topeka and prior boards of education, acting under same statutory authority, have established and operated in said city four elementary schools in the same grades for Negro children. Negro children may attend any one of said elementary schools that they or their parents may select. It was stipulated in the Court below that the Negro schools are located in neighborhoods in which the population is predominantly Negro. (R. 31.) The stipulation also indicates that at the time the action was brought, the enrollment in the eighteen white schools was 6,019, as compared to 658 students enrolled in the four Negro schools. (R. 37.)

The administration of the entire Topeka school system is under the Board of Education, and the same administrative regulations govern both the white and Negro schools. The Court found specifically that there is no material difference in the physical facilities in colored and white schools; that the educational qualifications of the teachers and the quality of instruction in the colored schools are not inferior to, but are comparable with those in the white schools; and that the courses of study followed in the two groups of schools are identical, being that prescribed by state law. (R. 245.) Also, it was found that colored students are furnished transportation to the segregated schools without cost to the children or their parents. No such transportation is furnished to the white children in the segregated schools. (R. 246.)

VII

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

1. The Kansas statute which permits cities of the first class to maintain separate grade school facilities for colored and white students does not per se violate the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The Court below found facilities provided for Negro children in the city of Topeka to be substantially equal to those furnished to white children. The appellants, in their specifications of error and in their brief, do not object to that finding. Under those circumstances and under authority of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, the inferior federal courts, and the courts of last resort in numerous state jurisdictions, and particularly the decisions of the Kansas Supreme Court, the appellants herein are not denied equal protection of the laws by virtue of their being required to attend schools separate from those which white children are required to attend.

BLEED THROUGH

The decision of the court below should be affirmed.

2. Irrespective of the question of the constitutionality of the Kansas statute, the trial court's findings of fact are insufficient to establish appellants' right to injunctive relief and to require reversal of the judgment below. The only finding of fact relied upon by appellants is Finding of Fact No. VIII. That finding is couched in general language and in effect simply shows that segregation in the public schools has a detrimental effect upon colored children and a tendency to retain or retard their educational and mental development and to deprive them of some of the benefits they would receive in a racial integrated school system. The finding does not specifically show that any of the appellants have actually and personally suffered by reason of segregation in the public schools of Topeka nor that the mental development of any of the appellants in this case has been retarded; and the finding does not even purport to show discrimination against the appellants and in favor of any other students in the Topeka school system. It no where discusses the effect of segregation upon children of any race other than colored children. Therefore, the District Court's Finding of Fact No. VIII fails to show either that the appellants have suffered any personal harm, or that they are being deprived of benefits or subjected to detriments which do not equally apply to other students in the Topeka school system. Thus, the appellants have failed to secure findings of fact sufficient to entitle them to injunctive relief or to a reversal of the judgment below.

1

DOES A STATUTE WHICH PERMITS BUT DOES NOT REQUIRE CITIES OF MORE THAN 15,000 POPULATION TO MAINTAIN SEPARATE SCHOOL FACILITIES FOR COLORED AND WHITE STUDENTS VIOLATE THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES IN A SITUATION WHERE A COURT HAS SPECIFICALLY FOUND THAT THERE IS NO DISCRIMINATION OR DISTINCTION IN PHYSICAL FACILITIES, EDUCATIONAL QUALIFICATIONS OF TEACHERS, CURRICULA OR TRANSPORTATION FACILITIES?

Appellees contend that only a negative answer to this question is possible.

BACKGROUND OF SEGREGATION IN KANSAS

A meaningful examination of any statute must necessarily be made in the light of its context. In Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 357, the Court comments:

> "So far, then, as a conflict with the 14th Amendment is concerned, the case reduces itself to the question of whether the statute . . . is a reasonable regulation, and with respect to this, there must necessarily be a large discretion on the part of the legislature. In determining the question of reasonableness, it is at liberty to act with reference to the established usages, customs, and traditions of the people, and with a view to the promotion of > their comfort, and the preservation of the public peace and good order."

Therefore, we deem it proper to pause briefly to examine the origins and attitudes of the people of the State of Kansas.

The birth of the State of Kansas was an incident of the intersectional struggle that culminated in the war between the states. Located midway between the north and the south, the territory of Kansas was coveted by both the pro-slavery and free-state elements. The Kansas-Nebraska Act which announced the principle of "squatter sovereignty" formally opened the territory for settlement and resulted in migration of large numbers of people from both the north and the south. In these early settlers were reflected the diverse attitudes and cultures of the regions from which they came. While the free-state elements from the north gained political ascendency, there remained in Kansas people who, in good faith, believed that the welfare of both the colored and the white races required that they live apart from one another. Migration following the war between the states followed the same pattern. While the greatest number came from Illinois, Ohio, Indiana and other northern states, a considerable segment of the population had its origin in Kentucky, Tennessee and Missouri. (Clark & Roberts, People of Kansas, 1936, p. 18.)

BLEED THROUGH

The early legislatures were faced with the task of reconciling the divergent attitudes of the settlers from such varied cultural backgrounds.

The Wyandotte Constitution, under which the State of Kansas was admitted to the Union, provided for a system of public education specifically requiring the legislature to "encourage the promotion of intellectual, moral, scientific and agricultural improvement, by establishing a uniform system of common schools and schools of a higher grade, embracing normal, preparatory, collegiate and university departments." (Const., Art. 6, Sec. 1.) It is significant that an effort was made in the Wyandotte convention to obtain a constitutional requirement for the separate education of Negro children. The proposal was defeated, not because of objection to the intrinsic policy of segregation, but because the dominant faction in the constitutional convention believed that the power to govern the public schools and to classify students therein should rest with the legislature. At no time was doubt expressed that the constitutional provision adopted at Wyandotte would preclude classification of students on the basis of color (Wyandotte Constitutional Convention, Proceedings and Debates, 1859, pp. 171 to 174).

As early as 1862 the power to classify students was exercised by the enactment of section 18, article 4, chapter 46,

Compiled Laws of 1862, applying to cities of not less than 7,000 inhabitants. That statute provided:

> "The city council of any city under this act shall make provisions for the appropriation of all taxes for school purposes collected from black or mulatto persons, so that the children of such persons shall receive the benefit of all moneys collected by taxation for school purposes from such persons, in schools separate and apart from the schools hereby authorized for the children of white persons."

Chapter 18, Laws of 1868, entitled "An Act to Incorporate Cities of the First Class" authorized the organization and maintenance of separate schools for the education of white and colored children in cities of over 15,000 population. In 1876 the laws of the state pertaining to the common schools were codified and embodied in one comprehensive statute. (Chapter 122.) Article X of this chapter related to the public schools and cities of the first class, and provided that all cities of more than 15,000 inhabitants shall be governed thereby. The provision of the law of 1868 authorizing the maintenance of separate schools for white and colored children was omitted from that section and was thus deemed to have been repealed by implication. However, in 1879 a statute was passed (Laws of 1879, Chapter 81) amending the law relating to cities of the first class and specifically authorizing the boards of education therein to organize and maintain separate elementary schools for the education of white and colored children. The section was again amended by Laws of 1905, Chapter 414, and now appears without further change in G. S. 1949, 72-1724, quoted above.

BLEED THROUGH

Two features of the Kansas statute should be emphasized. In the first place, we invite the court's attention to the fact that the statute is permissive only and does not, as may be inferred from appellants' brief, require any board of education to maintain separate schools for colored children.

In the second place, it is again pointed out that the statute applies only to cities of the first class. Cities of the first class in Kansas include those cities having a population of more than 15,000 persons. Presently there are ~~fourteen~~ 12 cities in the state so classified. The special provision affecting only these communities may be accounted for by reference to the fact that the Negro population of Kansas is largely urban. According to the 1950 census, less than four percent of the total population of Kansas belongs to the Negro race. However, more than ninety percent of this colored population lives in cities classified as urban. Sixty percent of the total colored population live in the three largest cities of Kansas City, Wichita and Topeka, and at least thirty-five percent of this total live in Kansas City alone. Thus, in enacting a school segregation statute applicable only to cities of the first class the Kansas legislature has simply recognized that there are situations where Negroes live in sufficient numbers to create special school problems and has sought to provide a law sufficiently elastic to enable Boards of Education in such communities to handle such problems as they may, in the exercise of their discretion and best judgment, deem most advantageous to their local school system under their local conditions.

THE KANSAS DECISIONS

The Supreme Court of Kansas has uniformly held that the governing bodies of school districts in the state may maintain separate schools for colored children only when expressly authorized by statute. (Board of Education v. Tinnon, 26 Kan. 1 (1881); Knox v. Board of Education, 45 Kan. 152, 25 Pac. 616 (1891); Cartwright v. Board of Education, 73 Kan. 302, 84 Pac. 382 (1906); Rowles v. Board of Education, 76 Kan. 361, 91 Pac. 88 (1907); Wool-ridge, et al., v. Board of Education, 98 Kan. 397, 157 Pac. 1184 (1916); Thurman-Watts v. Board of Education, 115 Kan. 328, 22 Pac. 123 (1924); Webb v. School District, 167 Kan. 395, 206 Pac. 2d 1066 (1949).

The rationale of each of these cases is expressed in Thurman-Watts v. Board of Education, supra, as follows:

BLEED THROUGH

> "The power and duty of the school board are derived exclusively from the statutes. The school board has no greater power than is conferred on it by the statutes."

It is significant that in each of the cases cited above, the court expressly recognized or conceded that the legislature has power to classify students in the public schools on the basis of color. Illustrative of this attitude is the following statement from Board of Education v. Tinnon, supra, appearing on p. 16 of the reported decision:

> "For the purpose of this case we shall assume that the legislature has the power to authorize the board of education of any city or the officers of any school district to establish separate schools for the education of white and colored children, and to exclude the colored children from the white schools notwithstanding the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States;"

In each of the subsequent cases where the power to segregate was denied by reason of the absence of statutory authority, the court specifically recognized that the legislature had such authority to confer. (See cases above cited.)

The question of the constitutionality of a statute, antecedent to but substantially like the one here under attack, was squarely presened to the Supreme Court of Kansas in the case of Reynolds v. Board of Education, 66 Kan. 672, 72 Pac. 274. That was a proceeding in the nature of mandamus brought against the board of education of the city of Topeka by a colored resident. In the action he sought to compel the board of education to admit his child to a school maintained for white children only. In an exhaustive opinion the court found that the statute which permitted the policy of racial segregation to be valid and not in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The court relied specifically on the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Plessy v. Ferguson, supra, and held that where facilities are equal, the mere fact of separation of races within a school system does not constitute a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Quoting with approval from the New York case of People, ex rel., Cisco v. School Board, 161 N. Y. 598, 56 N. E. 81, 48 L. R. A. 115, the Court said:

> "The most that the constitution requires the legislature to do is to furnish a system of common schools where each and every child may be educated; not that all must be educated in any one school, but that it shall provide or furnish a school or schools where each and all may have the advantages guaranteed by that instrument. If the legislature determined that it was wise for one class of pupils to be educated by themselves, there is nothing in the constitution > to deprive it of the right to so provide. It was the facilities for and the advantages of an education that it was required to furnish to all the children, and not that it should provide for them any particular class of associates while such education was being obtained."

BLEED THROUGH

And the court found merit in the quoted portion of the decision in the Massachusetts case of Roberts v. City of Boston, 5 Cush. 198:

> "It is urged that this maintenance of separate schools tends to deepen and perpetuate the odious distinction of caste, founded in a deep-rooted prejudice in public opinion. This prejudice, if it exists, is not created by law, and probably cannot be changed by law. Whether this distinction and prejudice, existing in the opinion and feelings of the community, would not be as effectually fostered by compelling colored and white children to associate together in the same schools, may well be doubted; at all events, it is a fair and proper question for the committee to consider and decide upon, having in view the best interests of both classes of children placed under their superintendence, and we cannot say, that their decision upon it is not founded on just grounds of reason and experience, and in the results of a discriminating and honest judgment."

Consistent with its finding that the statute did not violate the equal protection guarantee of the Fourteenth Amendment, the Court said on page 689:

> "The design of the common-school system of this state is to instruct the citizen, and where for this > purpose they have placed within his reach equal means of acquiring an education with other persons, they have discharged their duty to him, and he has received all that he is entitled to ask of the government with respect to such privileges."

Finally on page 292 the court holds:

> "The act of the legislature of 1879 providing for the education of white and colored children in separate schools in cities of the first class except in the high school is, therefore, in all respects constitutional and valid."

At the same time the Kansas court has always insisted that facilities must be equal for all groups. Particularly significant is the case of Williams v. Parsons, 79 Kan. 202, decided in 1908. There objection was made that the school provided for colored children was located in such close proximity to the railroad tracks that such location produced an undue hazard to the children attending the school. The court stated, at page 209:

> "Having power to maintain separate schools in cities of the first class, the duty rests upon the board of education therein to give equal educational facilities to both white and colored children in such schools. This requirement must have a practical interpretation so that it may be reasonably applied to varying circumstances. . . . Where the location of a school is such as to substantially deprive some of the children of the district of any educational facilities, it is manifest that this equality is not maintained and the refusal to furnish such > privileges, where it is practicable to do so, is an abuse of discretion for which the courts will afford a remedy."

A later expression of the Supreme Court of Kansas is found in Graham v. Board of Education, 153 Kan. 840, decided in 1941. There the court said on page 842:

> "The authorities are clear that separate schools may be maintained for the white and colored races if the educational facilities provided for each are equal, unless such separation is in contravention of a specific state law."

Again on p. 846 the court comments with reference to the rule expressed in Reynolds v. Board of Education, supra:

> "The defendants cite the case of Reynolds v. Board of Education, 66 Kan. 672, 72 Pac. 274. The rules of law set out in that case are sound and are applied in this case."

These cases demonstrate that the Supreme Court of Kansas has never doubted that G. S. 1949, 72-1724, and its antecedent statutes is without the scope of the prohibitions imposed on the legislature by the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

THE CONTROLLING PRINCIPLES

The position taken by the Supreme Court of Kansas in the cases cited, supra, is sustained by the weight of the decisions of this Court in Plessy v. Ferguson, supra, and Gong Lum v. Rice, 275 U. S. 78; and in numerous decisions of the inferior federal courts and the appellate courts in other states.

Appellants suggest that the Plessy case is not applicable to the situation before us. Admittedly, the question presented in the Plessy case arose out of segregation of white and colored races in railroad cars and not segregation in the public schools. However, the decision of the Court rises above the specific facts in issue and announces a doctrine applicable to any social situation wherein the two races are brought into contact. In commenting upon the purpose and the limitations of the Fourteenth Amendment the Court makes the following statement:

> "The object of the Amendment was undoubtedly to enforce the absolute equality of the two races before the law, but in the nature of things it could not have been intended to abolish distinctions based upon color, or to enforce social, as distinguished from political equality, or a commingling of the two races upon terms unsatisfactory to either. Laws permitting and even requiring their separation in places where they are liable to be brought into contact do not necessarily imply the inferiority of either race to the other, and have been generally,

BLEED THROUGH

> if not universally, recognized as within the competency of the state legislatures in the exercise of their police power. The most common instance of this is connected with the establishment of separate schools for white and colored children which has been held to be a valid exercise of the legislative power even by courts of States where the political rights of the colored race have been longest and most earnestly enforced." (p. 554.)

Certainly this language refutes appellants' contention that the Plessy case has no application to these facts.

Appellants further state that Gong Lum v. Rice "is irrelevant to the issues in this case." This statement appears to justify a brief examination of the facts in the Gong case. Those facts may be summarized as follows:

The Constitution and statutes of the State of Mississippi provided for two school systems in each county. One system was for "white" children and the other system for "colored" children. Plaintiff sought to have his child who was a citizen of Chinese extraction admitted to the school maintained for white students in the county where she lived. She was refused admission by the school authorities. The Supreme Court of the United States unanimously affirmed the decision of the Supreme Court of Mississippi, refusing to grand a Writ of Mandamus to compel the school authorities to admit the Chinese-American citizen to the white school.

The opinion by Chief Justice Taft includes the following statement (pp. 85-86):

> "The question here is whether a Chinese citizen of the United States is denied equal protection of the laws when he is classed among the colored races and furnished facilities for education equal to that offered to all, whether white, brown, yellow or black. Were this a new question it would call for very full argument and consideration but we think that it is the same question which has been many times decided to be within the constitutional power of the state legislature to settle without intervention of the federal courts under the Federal Constitution."

To support this proposition the Court cites sixteen cases decided by federal courts and state courts of last resort, including Plessy v. Ferguson, supra.

We do not believe that appellants suggest that the rights of the Negro citizens differ from the rights of the Mongolian citizen, Martha Lum. If such an idea is advanced herein, this Court should have no more difficulty in disposing of that contention than it did of that phase of the Gong case where it seemed to be contended that a yellow child had different rights than a Negro child. The Court simply held that children of all races have equal rights but that those rights are not infringed upon when the state provides that the different races shall be educated in separate schools of equal facility.

BLEED THROUGH

Appellants further contend that whatever force the Plessy and Gong-Lum cases may have had has been overcome by the recent decisions of Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629, and McLaurin v. Oklahoma, 339 U. S. 637. Appellees concede that if there has been any change in the attitude of this Court as to the constitutionality of the separate but equal doctrines as it affects segregation, it must be found in these two cases. Thus, we have examined them carefully. But we find no statement therein that would cause us to believe the Court intended to reverse or modify its earlier decisions. In the Sweatt case, the Court held that a Negro prospective law student could not be denied admission to the renowned University of Texas Law School — "one of the nation's ranking law schools" (p. 663), and be compelled to accept instruction in a new school of perhaps questionable worth, inferior as to faculty, plant and student body. The McLaurin case only found that a Negro graduate student, who had successfully compelled his admission to the University of Oklahoma to do graduate work in education, was still being denied equal rights when he was segregated inside the university as to his seat in class, in the library and in the dining hall. Unquestionably, these cases sustain the position that equal facilities must be provided. However, that point is not at issue in this case.

We think the Sweatt case has no greater significance than the following expression of the Court's attitude indicates:

> "This case and McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents . . . present different aspects of this general question: To what extent does the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment limit the power of a state to distinguish between students of different races in professional and graduate education in a state university? Broader issues have been urged for our consideration, but we adhere to the principle of deciding constitutional questions only in the context of the particular case before the court." (p. 631.)

Squarely in point is the following statement:

> "We cannot, therefore, agree with respondents that the doctrine of Plessy v. Ferguson, 1896, 163 U. S. 537, 16 S. Ct. 1138, 41 L. Ed. 256, requires affirmance of the judgment below. Nor need we reach the petitioner's contention that Plessy v. Ferguson should be re-examined in the light of contemporary knowledge respecting the purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment and the effects of racial segregation. See, supra, pg. 631." (pp. 635-636.)

And in the McLaurin case the significance of the special situation is noted by the Court:

> "Our society grows increasingly complex, and our need for trained leaders increases correspondingly. Appellant's case represents, perhaps, the epitome of > that need, for he is attempting to obtain an advanced degree in education, to become, by definition, a leader and trainer of others. Those who will come under his guidance and influence must be directly affected by the education he receives. Their own education and development will necessarily suffer to the extent that his training is unequal to that of his classmates. State-imposed restrictions which produce such inequalities cannot be sustained.

BLEED THROUGH

>
> "It may be argued that appellant will be in no better position when these restrictions are removed, for he may still be set apart by his fellow students. This we think is irrelevant. There is a vast difference — a constitutional difference between restrictions imposed by the state which prohibit the intellectual commingling of students, and the refusal of individuals to commingle where the state presents no such bar . . . Appellant having been admitted to a state-supported graduate school, he must receive the same treatment at the hands of the state as students of other races." (pp. 641, 642.)

In the Sweatt and McLaurin cases the Court specifically refused to consider the issue of constitutionality of racial separation in schools of equal facility in view of contemporary knowledge and held only that where the State did not furnish equal facilities for one race, the students of that race were being denied equal protection of the laws. Appellees contend that this refusal by the Court to review the Plessy and Gong-Lum doctrines in its later decisions can only be interpreted to support the view that those cases still stand as expressions of the rule established by the Supreme Court upon the question of racial segregation within the public schools.

Notable among decisions since the Sweatt and McLaurin cases are Carr v. Corning, 182 F. 2d 14; Briggs v. Elliott, 98 F. Supp. 529; and Davis v. County School Board, 103 F. Supp. 337, the latter two cases now pending before this Court on appeal. Carr v. Corning involved the public school system of the District of Columbia. There the Court noted a fact that we deem most significant with respect to the original meaning and intent of the Fourteenth Amendment. It was pointed out that in the same year that Congress proposed the amendment, federal legislation was enacted providing for segregation of the races in the public schools in the District of Columbia.

> "We are not unmindful of the debates which occurred in Congress relative to the Civil Rights Act of April 9, 1866, the Fourteenth Amendment, and the Civil Rights Act of March 1, 1875. But the actions of Congress, the discussion in the Civil Rights Cases, and the fact that in 1862, 1864, 1866 and 1874 Congress, as we shall point out in a moment, enacted legislation which specifically provided for separation of the races in the schools of the District of Columbia, conclusively support our view of the Amendment and its effect." (p. 17.)

BLEED THROUGH

Here we note the parallel situation in the State of Kansas. There the State, through its Legislature, ratified the Fourteenth Amendment in 1867, and only one year later legislation providing for separation of the races in the public schools of first class cities was enacted. (L. 1868, ch. 18.)

An examination of all the cases in American jurisdictions supporting the appellants' position would become repetitious and tedious. Thus, we refrain from an exhaustive survey. We believe the comment of Circuit Judge Parker in Briggs v. Elliott, supra, aptly summarizes the law and its justification:

> "One of the great virtues of our constitutional system is that, while the federal government protects the fundamental rights of the individual, it leaves to the several states the solution of local problems. In a country with a great expanse of territory with peoples of widely differing customs and ideas, local self government in local matters is essential to the peace and happiness of the people in the several communities as well as to the strength and unity of the country as a whole. It is universally held, therefore, that each state shall determine for itself, subject to the observance of the fundamental rights and liberties guaranteed by the federal Constitution, how it shall exercise the police power, i.e., the power to legislate with respect to the safety, morals, health and general welfare. And in no field is this right of the several states more clearly recognized than in that of public education." (P. 532.)

Justice Holmes has expressed the following view:

> "I must add one general consideration. There is nothing that I more deprecate than the use of the Fourteenth Amendment beyond the absolute compulsion of its words to prevent the making of social experiments that an important part of the community desires, in the insulated chambers afforded by the several states, even though the experiments may seem futile or even noxious to me and to those whose judgment I most respect. (Holmes, J., dissenting opinion, Truax v. Corrigan, 257 U. S. 312, p. 344, 42 S. Ct. 124, 66 L. Ed. 254, 27 A. L. R. 375.)"

It is undoubtedly true that the separate but equal doctrine is susceptible of abuse. In many instances it has resulted in a separate and unequal rule in practice. However, it is the impossibility of equality under such a doctrine, and not the difficulty of administering and applying the same with equality, that would make such a doctrine unconstitutional per se. The situation in Topeka is one where substantial equality has been reached. Such was the finding of the Court below (R. 245) and such is apparently conceded by the appellants (Appellants' Brief, p. 5). These facts, under authority of decisions heretofore reviewed, compel an inescapable conclusion: Neither the statute of Kansas nor the action of the appellee, Board of Education, offends the Fourteenth Amendment to the Federal Constitution.

BLEED THROUGH

THE PROSPECT

At the outset we suggested that the Kansas statute is permissive and that any Board of Education included in the statute may adopt a policy consistent with local conditions and local attitudes. We believe it is significant that under this statute by a process of evolution the people in Kansas communities are arriving at their own solutions to this problem. Under the statute ~~fourteen~~ 12 cities are authorized to maintain separate schools for colored students. The files of the State Superintendent of Public Instruction indicate that at the present time, only nine cities exercise the power conferred by statute. Wichita, the largest city in the state, has abandoned segregation only recently. The city of Pittsburg abandoned the policy of segregation only two years ago. Lawrence, seat of the state university, is now in the process of ending the operation of segregated schools.

This account of events not in the record is related to illustrate the wisdom which underlies the Kansas statute. Only those cities where local conditions produce special problems making segregation desirable need adopt the expedient of segregation. In the orderly progress of the community, these special problems are either solved or vanish, and when the need for segregation disappears, its practice may be discontinued. This was the method provided by the legislature of the State of Kansas to achieve the goal of an integrated school system where segregation is not needed. We respectfully suggest to the court that this evolutionary process permitting an autonomous solution in the community is consistent with the purpose and intent of the Fourteenth Amendment.

BLEED THROUGH

THE DISTRICT COURT'S FINDING OF FACT NO. VIII IS INSUFFICIENT TO ESTABLISH APPELLANTS' RIGHT TO INJUNCTIVE RELIEF AND TO REQUIRE REVERSAL OF THE JUDGMENT BELOW.

(a) Counsel for Appellants have overstated their case.

Appellant has raised and preserved this issue by its third Assignment of Error, to wit:

> "The District Court erred:
>
>
> . . . . . .
>
> "3. In refusing to enter judgment in favor of plaintiffs, after the court found that plaintiffs suffered serious harm and detriment in being required to attend segregated elementary schools in the City of Topeka, and were deprived thereby of benefits they would have received in a racially integrated school system." (R. 250.)

And by adopting its Assignment of Errors in its Statement of Points to Be Relied Upon (R. 253).

The District Court's Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law appear at pp. 244 to 247 of the Transcript of the Record.

There is no Finding of Fact which literally and specifically corresponds to the finding mentioned in Appellants' third Assignment of Error.

At page 2 of the Brief for Appellants under the heading Questions Presented, appellants state the second issue, as follows:

> "Whether the finding of the court below—that racial segregation in public elementary schools has the detrimental effect of retarding the mental and educational development of colored children and connotes governmental acceptance of the conception of racial inferiority—compels the conclusion that appellants here are deprived of their rights to share equally in educational opportunities in violation of the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment."

There is no Finding of Fact which literally and specifically corresponds to the finding mentioned in appellants' statement of the second issue.

At page 10 of the Brief for Appellant, counsel state:

> "Applying this yardstick, any restrictions or distinction based upon race or color that places the Negro at a disadvantage in relation to other racial groups in his pursuit of educational opportunities is violative of the equal protection clause.
>
> "In the instant case, the court found as a fact that appellants were placed at such a disadvantage and were denied educational opportunities equal to those available to white students.
>
> ". . . . . .
>
> "Thus, notwithstanding that it had found inequality in educational opportunity as a fact, the court concluded as a matter of law that such inequality did not constitute a denial of constitutional rights, saying: . . ."

There is no such finding of fact in the Record in this case.

BLEED THROUGH

With all respect due to able counsel for appellants we believe that in their zeal for their cause, they have overstated their case. The only existing Finding of Fact which is relied upon by appellants and the only one quoted in their brief is the District Court's Finding of Fact No. VIII, which we quote accurately:

> "Segregation of white and colored children in public schools has a detrimental effect upon the colored children. The impact is greater when it has the sanction of the law; for the policy of separating the races is usually interpreted as denoting the inferiority of the Negro group. A sense of inferiority affects the motivation of a child to learn. Segregation with the sanction of law, therefore, has a tendency to retain the educational and mental development of Negro children and to deprive them of some of the benefits they would receive in a racial integrated school system."

We call attention to the fact that the foregoing Finding is couched only in broad and general language; it makes no specific or particular reference to any of the appellants, nor to the grade schools in Topeka, nor to racial groups other than Negroes, nor to inequality of educational opportunities between Negroes and other racial groups. The substance of the finding can be summarized in the following statement: "Generally speaking, segregation is detrimental to colored children, and deprives them of some benefits they would receive in a racial integrated school system."

The Finding of Fact No. VIII cannot be stretched, as counsel for appellants apparently would like to stretch it, into a finding that the appellants in this case have "suffered serious harm in being required to attend segregated elementary schools in Topeka" and that "appellants were placed at such a disadvantage (in relation to other racial groups in [their] pursuit of educational opportunities) and were denied educational opportunities equal to those available to white students."

(b) Elements Necessary to Entitle Appellants to Injunctive Relief and to a Reversal of the Judgment in This Case.

To establish appellants' right to injunctive relief and to reversal of the judgment in this case, the Findings of Fact No. VIII would have to show:

> (1) That the appellants have actually suffered personal harm as the result of attending segregated schools in Topeka; and,
>
> (2) Either that appellants are being deprived of benefits which other students in the Topeka school system enjoy, or that appellants are being subjected to detriments to which other students in the Topeka school system are not being subjected, by reason of maintenance of a segregated school system.

BLEED THROUGH

The mere showing that appellants may be members of a class which is being discriminated against by reason of a statute is not sufficient to entitle them to injunctive relief, unless appellants can also show that they personally are suffering harm. The Fourteenth Amendment protects only personal and individual rights.

The mere showing that appellants can show that they are being deprived of benefits they would receive under a different system of schools is not sufficient to show that they are being deprived of equal protection of the law, unless appellants can also show that under the existing segregate school system there are others who are not deprived of such benefits.

And finally, the mere showing that segregation is detrimental to appellants is not sufficient to show that they are being deprived of equal protection of the laws, unless they also show that segregation is not similarly detrimental to others in the Topeka school system.

McCabe v. A. T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 235 U. S. 151, 59 Law Ed. 149:

> "There is, however, an insuperable obstacle to the granting of the relief sought by this bill. It was filed, as we have seen, by five persons against five railroad corporations to restrain them from complying with the state statute. The suit had been brought before the law went into effect, and this amended bill was filed very shortly after. It contains some general allegations as to discriminations in the supply of facilities and as to the hardships which will ensue. It states that there will be 'A multiplicity of suits,' there being at least 'fifty thousand persons of the Negro race in the state of Oklahoma' who will be injured and deprived of their civil rights. But we are dealing here with the case of the complainants, and nothing is shown to entitle them to an injunction. It is an elementary principle that, in order to justify the granting of this extraordinary relief, the complainant's need of it, and the absence of an adequate remedy at law, must clearly appear. The complainant cannot succeed because someone else may be hurt. Nor does it make any difference that other persons who may be injured are persons of the same race or occupation. It is the fact, clearly established, of injury to the complainant—not to others—which justifies judicial intervention." (p. 162.)

Turpin v. Lemon, 187 U. S. 51, 47 Law Ed. 70:

"This is an effort to test the constitutionality of the law, without showing that the plaintiff had been injured by its application, and, in this particular, the case falls without ruling in Tyler v. Registration Court Judges, 179 U. S. 405, 45 L. ed. 252, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 206, wherein we held that the plaintiff was bound to show he had personally suffered an injury before he could institute a bill for relief. In short, the case made by the plaintiff is purely academic." (pp. 60, 61.)

BLEED THROUGH

Thomas Cusack Co. v. Chicago, 242 U. S. 526, 61 Law Ed. 472:

> "He who is not injured by the operation of a law or ordinance cannot be said to be deprived by it of either constitutional right or of property." (p. 530.)

Mallinckrodt Chemical Works v. Missouri ex rel. Jones, 238 U. S. 41, 59 L. ed. 1192:

> "As has been often pointed out, one who seeks to set aside a state statute as repugnant to the Federal Constitution must show that he is within the class with respect to whom the act is unconstitutional, and that the alleged unconstitutional feature injures him." (p. 54.)

(c) Finding of Fact No. VIII Fails to Disclose That Any of the Appellants Have Been Actually and Personally Harmed by Segregation in the Topeka Schools.

Finding of Fact No. VIII makes no specific reference to the individual appellants. It expresses only in broad generalities the effect of segregation in the public schools upon colored children as a class. There is no specific finding that segregation has had a personal detrimental effect upon any of the appellants. There is no specific finding that any of the appellants personally has interpreted segregation as denoting inferiority of the Negro group, or that the motivation to learn of any of the appellants has been affected by a sense of inferiority. There is no finding that the educational and mental development of any of the appellants has actually been retained or retarded by reason of segregation in the Topeka schools. In short there is no finding that any of the appellants individually and actually has been harmed by segregation in the Topeka school system.

(d) Finding of Fact No. VIII Fails to Disclose That Appellants Are Being Deprived of Equal Protection of the Laws, or That They Are Being Discriminated Against by Segregation in the Topeka Schools.

Denial of equal protection of the laws, or discrimination, logically and necessarily involves at least two persons who are being treated differently. Denial of equal protection must mean denial of protection or opportunity equal to that afforded to someone else. There can be no such thing as "unilateral discrimination."

Since the Finding of Fact No. VIII is limited solely to a statement of the effect of segregation on colored children as a group, and nowhere mentions the effect of segregation upon any other race or group, it cannot reasonably or logically show discrimination or a denial of equal protection of the laws.

Nowhere in the finding has the court disclosed any facts upon which it can be claimed to show discrimination in favor of white children over colored in segregated schools.

It is idle on this appeal to speculate upon what the trial court might have found had it been requested to make additional findings. No request for additional findings was made in the trial court. We therefore refrain from speculating as to whether the court would also have found that segregation was detrimental to white children and impaired their educational and mental development.

(e) The District Court Did Not Intend Nor Consider Its Finding of Fact No. VIII To Be a Finding of Discrimination Against Appellants.

The last sentence in Finding of Fact No. VIII summarizes the entire finding. We quote:

> "Segregation with the sanction of law, therefore, has a tendency to retain the educational and mental development of Negro children and to deprive them of some of the benefits they would receive in a racial integrated school system."

We believe the court intended the finding to mean simply that colored children would be better off in integrated schools than they are in segregated schools. Conceding that that is the meaning of the finding, it does not amount to a finding of actual discrimination against colored children and in favor of white children upon the facts in this case. White children are not permitted to attend integrated schools in Topeka. The mere fact, if it be a fact, that the Topeka school system could be improved so far as education of colored children is concerned, does not prove discrimination against them.

In the opinion of the District Court (R. 238 to 244), 98 F. Supp. 797, no mention is made of Finding of Fact No. VIII. It is clear the District Court did not consider or intend to attach to that finding the same significance which appellants seek to place upon it.

We do not question that if the Finding of Fact No. VIII means everything appellants claim it means, they would be entitled to an injunction and reversal of the judgment, if this court should overrule the "separate but equal doctrine." However, it is clear that the District Court did not intend or consider the finding to mean all the things appellants claim for it. As stated in the Decree of the District Court:

> "The Court has heretofore filed its Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law together with an opinion and has held as a matter of law that the plaintiffs have failed to prove they are entitled to the relief demanded."

In the Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, 1953

OLIVER BROWN, MRS. RICHARD LAWTON, MRS. SADIE EMMANUEL, et al., Appellants, vs.

BOARD OF EDUCATION OF TOPEKA, SHAWNEE COUNTY, KANSAS, et al., Appellees.

No. 1

Appeal from the United States District Court for the District of Kansas

BRIEF FOR THE STATE OF KANSAS ON REARGUMENT

Statement

Appellants seek reversal of a judgment of the United States District Court for the District of Kansas whereby said court refused to enjoin the Appellee board of education from maintaining separate public elementary schools for negro children, pursuant to section 72-1724, General Statutes of Kansas, 1949, and to hold said statute violative of the Constitution of the United States. The State of Kansas, acting through its Attorney General, filed a separate answer in the court below for the sole and specific purpose of defending the validity of the statute,[1] and appeared in this court for that purpose.

Briefs were submitted and the cause was argued before this court on December 10, 1952.[2] Citation to the opinion below, jurisdictional statement, statement of the case, the questions presented and statute involved are fully set out in appellees' original brief. Hence, they are not repeated here.

The Court's Order

On June 8, 1953, the Court ordered that the case be restored to the docket and assigned for reargument. Counsel were requested to give their special attention to the questions set out below insofar as they are germane to this case:

> "Each of these cases is ordered restored to the docket and is assigned for reargument on Monday, October 12, next. In their briefs and on oral argument counsel are requested to discuss particularly the following questions insofar as they are relevant to the respective cases:
>
> "1. What evidence is there that the Congress which submitted and the State legislatures and conventions which ratified the Fourteenth Amendment contemplated or did not contemplate, understood or did not understand, that it would abolish segregation in public schools?
>
> "2. If neither the Congress in submitting nor the States in ratifying the Fourteenth Amendment understood that compliance with it would require the immediate abolition of segregation in public schools, was it nevertheless the understanding of the framers of the Amendment

"(a) that future Congresses might, in the exercise of their power under Sec. 5 of the Amendment, abolish such segregation, or

"(b) that it would be within the judicial power, in light of future conditions, to construe the Amendment as abolishing such segregation of its own force?

"3. On the assumption that the answers to questions 2 (a) and (b) do not dispose of the issue, is it within the judicial power, in construing the Amendment, to abolish segregation in public schools?

"4. Assuming it is decided that segregation in public schools violates the Fourteenth Amendment,

"(a) would a decree necessarily follow providing that, within the limits set by normal geographic school districting, Negro children should forthwith be admitted to schools of their choice, or

"(b) may this Court, in the exercise of its equity powers, permit an effective gradual adjustment to be brought about from existing segregated systems to a system not based on color distinctions?

"5. On the assumption on which questions 4(a) and (b) are based, and assuming further that this Court will exercise its equity powers to the end described in question 4(b),

"(a) should this Court formulate detailed decrees in these cases;

"(b) if so what specific issues should the decrees reach;

"(c) should this Court appoint a special master to hear evidence with a view to recommending specific terms for such decrees;

> "(d) should this Court remand to the courts of first instance with directions to frame decrees in these cases, and if so, what general directions should the decrees of this Court include and what procedures should the courts of first instance follow in arriving at the specific terms of more detailed decrees?

The Interest of the State of Kansas

On September 3, 1953, the appellee board of education adopted the following resolution:

> "Be it resolved that it is the policy of the Topeka Board of Education to terminate maintenance of segregation in the elementary schools as rapidly as practicable."

Two of the twenty-four elementary schools of the city are being operated on an integrated basis during the current school year. Segregation is presently practiced in the remaining schools.

Obviously, the State's relation to this litigation is not affected by the action of the Topeka Board of Education. The constitutionality of the statute is still under attack. The State intervened in the court below for the sole purpose of defending its validity. Counsel for the State have never advocated or defended the policy of racial segregation in the public schools or elsewhere. We advocate only a concept of constitutional law that permits determinations of state and local policy to be made on state and local levels. We defend only the validity of the statute that enables the Topeka Board of Education to determine its own course. We believe that no other position is consistent with the meaning and purpose of the Constitution of the United States.

BLEED THROUGH

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

1. All available evidence points to the conclusion that a majority of the Congress which submitted the Fourteenth Amendment, did not contemplate or understand that it would abolish segregation in the public schools. An analysis of the Congressional debates and the currents of Abolitionist thought during the period prior to and contemporaneous with the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment indicates that the general concern was with the fundamental rights of life, liberty and property and that by Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment they sought to guarantee the negro equality of enjoyment of these rights. The right to mingle with other races in the public schools was not included in this concept of basic rights. The Congress further demonstrated by direct legislation that it did not consider segregation to be a violation of constitutional rights. By its own act it provided segregated schools for the District of Columbia, over which it has exclusive legislative power. Furthermore, subsequent to adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment, the Congress specifically refused to enact legislation prohibiting segregation in the public schools.

2. Neither was it the understanding of the states which ratified the Fourteenth Amendment that it would abolish segregation in the public schools. The laws of a majority of the states authorized segregation at the time the Fourteenth Amendment was ratified. There is no evidence that any state altered its policy in this respect by reason of the Fourteenth Amendment. On the other hand, it is a fact that in at least ten states the same legislatures that ratified the Fourteenth Amendment enacted legislation providing separate schools. This we deem evidence that the states did not contemplate that segregation was precluded by the Fourteenth Amendment.

3. Inasmuch as it was the understanding of the framers, the Congress which submitted, and the states which ratified the Fourteenth Amendment, that segregation in the public schools was not included within its purview, it could not have been contemplated at that time that any future federal authority, either legislative or judicial, might abolish segregation without further grant of constitutional authority. However, if, in spite of evidence to the contrary, it is conceived that segregation might be brought within the purview of federal authority, then, consistent with the intent of the framers, it is for the Congress and not the judiciary to act.

4. It is not within the judicial powers to construe the Fourteenth Amendment in a manner differently than the framers intended with reference to facts existing at the time the amendment was adopted, where no substantial change in conditions is shown. It was the intent of the framers of the Fourteenth Amendment that the management of the public schools should be left to the state legislatures. The federal judiciary may not now assume jurisdiction over this phase of state activity in disregard of the framers' intent.

5. The people of Kansas, through the normal processes of local government, are demonstrating their willingness and capacity to deal with local race problems in a manner most beneficial to all concerned. Federal interference is neither necessary nor justified.

ARGUMENT

I

The Legislative Intent

A. The Evidence is Persuasive that the Majority of the Members of the Thirty-ninth Congress neither Contemplated nor Understood that the Fourteenth Amendment would Abolish Segregation in the Public Schools.

The Fourteenth Amendment was proposed and submitted to the legislatures of the several states by the first session of the 39th Congress. The record of debates in that session is barren of relevant comment on the impact of the Fourteenth Amendment upon segregation in the public schools. Logically, the record could not be otherwise. The Congress simply did not deem itself to be legislating with respect to segregation in the public schools or elsewhere.

The Republican congressmen who conceived and enacted the reconstruction legislation of 1866 were concerned with far graver forms of discrimination than that incident to segregation and the relatively refined concept of "separate but equal" facilities. They were mindful of the welfare of a people that had within the decade been forcibly wrested from slavery; who were still subject to the extraordinary burdens and disabilities imposed by the Black Codes enacted by their late masters. The Congress was seeking to confer upon the emancipated race the essential incidents of citizenship, theretofore denied them by decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.[1] These were the conditions that Congress sought to alleviate. To infer more is unwarranted conjecture. At the same time the dominant group sought to discipline the states of the conquered Confederacy, and to perpetuate its own ascendancy.

1. Scott v. Sanford, 19 How. 393.

> ". . . we must not suppose that the men who fashioned the Fourteenth Amendment were concentered upon our nice constitutional question. Whether the freedman should be given the suffrage, what should be the new basis of representation in Congress and what would be the consequences for the two parties, how could the Confederate leaders best be excluded from the councils of the nation—political questions such as these dominated the hour." [2]

An analysis of the currents of Abolitionist thought and the conditions that produced them reinforces this conclusion.

1. The Concept of Equality

There can be no doubt that certain of the Abolitionist leaders demonstrated no tolerance for segregation. At the same time, there can be no doubt that they failed to impress their views upon the majority of their colleagues and to incorporate their philosophy into the legislation of Congress. Charles Sumner of Massachusetts, the most brilliant of them all, had long protested segregation. In 1850 he had urged to the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts that segregation in the public schools of Boston violated the constitutional principle of "equality before the law." He failed, however, to make his point.[3] In 1866, in a new forum, the United States Senate, he contended for a proposition that struck down "all laws and customs . . . establishing any oligarchical prejudices and any distinctions of rights on account of color or race." [4] Doubtless, Sumner's view precluded segregation. But again his view did not prevail. The Fourteenth Amendment, as adopted by the Congress, did not approach Sumner's broad concept of equal protection.

What then did the framers of the Fourteenth Amendment intend? It is suggested that the terms "full" and "equal" protection are synonymous. The central concern on the part of the proponents was with "the racial protection of persons or citizens in their natural rights. . . ." [5]

> "The language of the equal protection clause was held to be very little different from the command in the due process clause to protect men in the rights of life, liberty and property. . . ." [6]

In 1690, John Locke had argued that "all men are by nature equal . . . in that equal right that every man hath to his natural freedom, without being subject to the will or the authority of any other man; . . . being equal . . . no one ought to harm another in his life, health, liberty or possessions." [7]

In Locke's view, governments are instituted by compact which impose on the government the duty to preserve the life, liberty and fortunes of its citizens. The author of the Declaration of Independence may have been influenced by Locke's philosophy when he declared "that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty and the Pursuit of Happiness." However, it would be indeed speculative to suggest that Locke in the 17th century deemed freedom from segregation as part of the guarantee of life, health, liberty or possessions. And it would be equally untenable to suggest that Jefferson, a century later, regarded the Declaration of Independence as forbidding separate but equal facilities.

7. Locke, Second Treatise on Government (1698) Chap. 2, Sec. 6.

Equal protection, due process, and the term "civil right" all represented to the abolitionists the protection of certain fundamental rights guaranteed by the basic law. Howard Jay Graham has suggested that as early as 1836 the abolitionist argument had crystallized around these major propositions.

> "The great natural and fundamental rights of life, liberty and property, long deemed inherent and inalienable, were now held to be secured . . . and . . . race and color . . . whenever and wherever employed as criterion and determinant of fundamental rights, violated both the letter and spirit of American institutions." [8]

Scholars disagree as to whether all the guaranties of the first eight amendments were incorporated into the 14th Amendment, but they agree unanimously that Section 1 was intended to place the Civil Rights Bill of 1866 in the constitution. Says Flack:

> "The very men who passed the Civil Rights Bill submitted the 14th Amendment, the first section of which practically incorporated that bill." [9]

Fairman points out that the Civil Rights Bill in turn rests on the concept of fundamental rights pronounced by Justice Washington in Corfield v. Coryell.[10] These were:

> ". . . the protection of government, enjoyment of life and liberty, the right to acquire and possess property of all kinds, pursue happiness and safety, the right to move from state to state for trade, agricultural and professional pursuits, the right to the writ of habeas corpus, the right to institute and maintain suits in courts of law and not be subject to unfair taxes."

This, the Civil Rights Bill becomes especially significant. Its provisions were in part:

". . . That all persons born in the United States and not subject to any foreign Power, . . . are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States; and such citizens, . . . shall have the same right, in every State and Territory in the United States, to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property, and to full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property, as is enjoyed by white citizens, and shall be subject to like punishment, pains, and penalties, and to none other, . . ." [11]

However liberally we may construe these provisions, we find no evidence that they were intended to preclude segregation. The authors were concerned with protecting personal security and personal rights and were not proposing that every person should enjoy the privilege of exercising those rights at the same time and in the same place and manner as every other citizen. Only in those areas where the safety of the individual and his property were jeopardized was the law to operate.

II

The Concept of Equality in Congress

Senator Trumbull opened in support of the Civil Rights Bill on January 29, 1866. He alluded to

> ". . . the rights of citizens. And what are they? The great fundamental rights set forth in this bill: the right to acquire property, the right to go and come at pleasure, the right to enforce rights in the courts, to make contracts, and to inherit and dispose of property. These are the very rights that are set forth in this bill as appertaining to every freeman." [12]

Trumbull's concept seemed to include both the rights mentioned in the Declaration of Independence and those enumerated in Corfield v. Coryell, supra. In either case, however, only a most speculative mind can conceive these rights to include the abolition of segregation.

It is not merely because it was not argued that we believe the proponents did not intend to abolish segregation. It is because the rights which are emphasized throughout the debates belong to an entirely different class that we are persuaded that the Civil Rights Act did not limit the states' power to segregate.

In all the discussion preceding the adoption of the Civil Rights Bill Senator Trumbull's statement as to the scope of the act was not contraverted. It is true that Senator Johnson, an opponent, did suggest that the Civil Rights Bill would abolish state laws prohibiting mixed marriages, since all persons would have a right to contract equally. But Senator Fessenden, Chairman of the Joint Committee on Reconstruction, rejected the implication of this argumentum in terrorem and said that such would not be the result since the black "has the same right to make a contract of marriage with a white woman that a white man has with a black woman." [13]

The express terms of Civil Rights Bill may give some color to Senator Johnson's contention since the bill gave to all persons the same right to make and enforce contracts. Nevertheless, in the minds of the acknowledged pro civil rights leaders, it would not have that effect. How much more certain is it that the bill was not intended to abolish segregation in the schools, since none of its terms can even by implication be construed to have this effect. Senator Trumbull himself agreed that the rights enumerated in the bill did not give a person the right to vote nor does the mere act of making him a citizen give him such a right.[14] If the cherished privilege of suffrage is not included within the "rights of citizens," nor if it does not flow naturally from the fact of citizenship, is it not an untenable suggestion that freedom from segregation in schools is one of the rights embraced by the act.

James Wilson of Iowa, Chairman of the Committee on Judiciary, introduced the Civil Rights Bill in the House.[15] He mentioned "civil rights and immunities." "What," he asks, "do these terms mean? Do they mean that in all things, civil, social, political, all citizens without distinction of race or color, shall be equal?"

He answers:

> "By no means can they be so construed. Do they mean that all citizens shall vote in the several states? No. . . . Nor do they mean that all citizens shall sit on juries, or that their children shall attend the same schools. These are not civil rights or immunities."

Wilson next inquires as to what the fundamental rights are and for his answer he turns to Blackstone. There he finds that they are three-fold:

1. The right of personal security, which consists in one's legal and uninterrupted enjoyment of his life, his limbs, his body, his health and his reputation.

2. The right of personal liberty which consists in the power of locomotion, of changing situation or moving one's person to whatever place one's own inclination may direct without imprisonment or restraint unless by due course of law.

3. The right of personal property which consists in the free use, enjoyment and disposal of all his acquisitions without any control or diminution save only by the laws of the land.[16]

Wilson also mentions to Kent's declaration that the absolute rights of individuals may be resolved into "the right of personal security, the right of personal liberty, and the right to acquire and enjoy property." These are the rights that have been justly considered and frequently declared by the people of this country to be natural, inherent and inalienable.[17]

This would seem to indicate beyond doubt that the proponents of the Civil Rights Bill did not conceive that it went further than to guarantee those rights which were considered in the Declaration of Independence and which Justice Washington had enumerated in Corfield v. Coryell, supra. And we note specially that Wilson specifically contemplated that segregation in schools would not be abolished by the Civil Rights Bill.

We dwell at length upon the meaning and intent of the Civil Rights Bill. This we do for the reason that to understand its provisions is to understand the congressional concept of equality. As Professor ten Broek indicates:

> "The one point upon which historians of the 14th Amendment agree, and, indeed, which the evidence places beyond cavil, is that the 14th Amendment was designed to place the constitutionality of the Freedmen's Bureau and Civil Rights Bills, particularly the latter, beyond doubt." [18]

Thaddeus Stevens, like Senator Sumner, may have hoped that the Fourteenth Amendment might be designed to abolish segregation. Stevens' first draft of the proposed amendment offered on December 5, 1865, read:

> "All national and state laws shall be equally applicable to every citizen, and no discrimination shall be made on account of race or color."

If this draft had been retained, plaintiffs' contention might well be sustained. But by April 21, 1866, Stevens had submitted a new proposal the language of which is as follows:

> "No discrimination shall be made by any state, nor by the United States, as to the civil rights of persons because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

Thus Stevens, in some four months, had restricted his original proposal in order to limit the prohibition on discrimination to civil rights only, a term that clearly was not understood to include the right of racial amalgamation. Stevens apparently realized that his original proposition could not win the support of a majority of the Congress.

The same connection between the equal protection clause and the trilogy of life, liberty and property appears in Representative John A. Bingham's proposals which were 18. ten Broek, op. cit. 183.

finally adopted by Congress. His first draft suggested to the Joint Committee on Reconstruction was as follows:

> "The Congress shall have power to make all laws necessary and proper to secure to all persons in every state within this union equal protection in their rights of life, liberty and property." [19]

On January 20, 1866, a clause was inserted in the above granting all "citizens of the United States in every State, the same political rights and privileges." This clause was later dropped and on February 13, 1866, the following draft by Bingham was submitted to Congress by the Committee on Reconstruction:

> "The Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to secure to the citizens of each state all privileges and immunities of citizens of the several states and to all persons in the several states equal protection in the rights of life, liberty and property."

This draft was tabled while the Civil Rights Bill was enacted.

When the Joint Committee on Reconstruction resumed consideration of the Fourteenth Amendment on April 21, Stevens submitted his proposal, supra. His understanding of the meaning of his draft may be indicated by his later statement on the floor of Congress.

> "Whatever law protects the white man shall afford 'equal' protection to the black man. Whatever means of redress is afforded to one shall be afforded to all. Whatever law allows the white man to testify in Court shall allow the man of color > to do the same. These are great advantages over their present codes." [20]

Here he refers specifically to the "Black Codes," which had been adopted in many southern states to keep the colored population in continued subjection.

Bingham immediately offered an alternate draft; his proposal provided:

> "No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens in the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

While Stevens' draft was limited to a protection of the recently emancipated negro, Bingham's language seems to extend the guarantee of fundamental rights to all persons regardless of color, an enlargement probably suggested by the pre-civil war treatment of the abolitionists in the south. However, there is no evidence that Bingham's notion of the rights to be secured differed greatly from that of Stevens. The content of the guarantees was substantially the same.

We do not deem it significant that in the final draft of the Amendment the terms "life, liberty or property" became coupled with the due process clause. The emphasis then, as always, was on the protection of fundamental rights and the requirement was that these safeguards be made equal. We have already pointed out that the guarantees of equal protection and due process had substantially the same meaning to the abolitionists.[21] This would explain why Bingham so readily changed the portion of the phrase "life, liberty or property" from the equal protection to the due process clause. Bingham's draft in committee on February 3 further emphasizes this point It provided:

> "Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to secure to citizens of each state all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states (Art. II, Sec. 2), and to all persons in the several states equal protection in the rights of life, liberty and property. (5th Amendment.)" [22]

The parenthesized notations are in Bingham's handwriting and indicate that he considered the term equal protection as used in his text to be equivalent to the term due process as it appears in the Fifth Amendment. Bingham's own explanation as to why he altered certain provisions of his draft is that he did so in order that the Fourteenth Amendment might as much as possible "conform to the original form of the Constitution." [23] Life, liberty and property are mentioned in conjunction with due process in the Fifth Amendment. Bingham felt, therefore, that they should be similarly connected in the Fourteenth Amendment. Rights protected are still the fundamental and basic rights already described, and nothing more.

In the somewhat incomplete debates in Congress as to the meaning of the guarantees of Section 1 of the proposed Fourteenth Amendment, there is nothing from which we can infer that the proponents intended to give it a broader meaning than to protect the basic and fundamental rights about which the abolitionists had spoken theretofore. Abolition of segregation was not one of these. It is significant, perhaps, that a majority of the members of Congress represented states where segregation in the public schools was practiced with sanction of law. The same statement is true of a majority of the members of the Joint Committee on Reconstruction. Had there been an intent to disturb a social pattern so firmly established we believe that that intent would have been reflected in the Congressional debates. William Higby argued that the language of the proposed amendment was very little different from the privileges and immunities clause and the Fifth Amendment's guarantee of life, liberty and property.[24] Kelley of Pennsylvania said the amendment would give to the general government the right to defend the rights, liberties, privileges and immunities of the humblest citizen.[25]

Woodbridge of Vermont said:

> "It (the Fourteenth Amendment) is intended to enable Congress to give to all citizens the inalienable rights of life and liberty, and to every citizen in whatever state he may be that protection to his property which is extended to the other citizens of the state." [26]

Hale of New York saw the amendment as a grant to Congress of the right to legislate for the protection of life, liberty and property, simply qualified with the condition that all such legislation should apply to all persons equally.[27] Bingham argued that the proposed amendment gave Congress the power to enforce the Bill of Rights. A consideration of Bingham's position throughout the session inclines us to the belief that the Bill of Rights to which Bingham referred was not the first eight amendments, but rather the privileges and immunities clause in Article IV, and the guarantee that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law. Again Bingham contended that the Bill of Rights provides that "all shall be protected alike in life, liberty, and property." [28] Notice how this argument telescopes equal protection and due process. "Bingham, in fact, . . . speaks of equal protection and due process as but a single expression." [29]

Senator Howard of Michigan presented the Fourteenth Amendment to the Senate. There he announced:

> "The great object of the first section of this amendment is, therefore, to restrain the powers of the States and compel them at all times to respect these great fundamental guarantees." [30]

Research suggests that the fundamental guarantees about which the Senator speaks are those that had been outlined when the Civil Rights Bill was being debated. Because of the extensive debates in connection with the Civil Rights Bill, it was apparently not deemed necessary to repeat what had been said concerning the scope of these fundamental rights. We think, however, the record is conclusive that the framers of the Fourteenth Amendment did not contemplate that it would have the effect of abolishing segregation in the schools. In every instance, where they describe the guarantee of equal protection, they related it to the protection of the fundamental rights of life, liberty and property. The abolition of segregation has never been included within the terms of this guarantee. The fact that after the Fourteenth Amendment was adopted some members of Congress may have felt that it abolished or authorized the abolishment of segregation in the schools is not decisive. Senator Carpenter's argument in the 42nd Congress that the Fourteenth Amendment gave Congress the right to abolish segregation in the schools does not prove that Congress had agreed that the Fourteenth Amendment would abolish segregation.[31] Nor does the Civil Rights Bill of March 1, 1875, giving to negroes full and equal privileges in hotels, streetcars, passenger trains, steamboats or other public conveyances, in theaters and other places of public amusement prove that Congress had intended to abolish segregation by the Fourteenth Amendment. Self-serving declarations after the event cannot be used to prove prior intent. To determine prior intent we must rely exclusively on those statements made public before the amendment was adopted. When these are investigated, there is a complete absence of evidence that the equal protection clause was calculated to abolish segregation. Furthermore, an enumeration of the guarantees which were included, expressly negatives the possibility that the framers of the Fourteenth Amendment contemplated such an effect.

Contemporaneous Congressional Policies in the District of Columbia

However persuasive may be the evidence thus far assembled, it is still circumstantial. It has been adduced by a process of analysis and inference. But there is other testimony that is positive and direct. We refer to the congressional acts establishing racial segregation in the public schools of the District of Columbia.

Congress has exclusive power to legislate for the District of Columbia. The 37th and 38th Congresses, in 1862 and 1864, established segregated public school systems in the District.[32] The 39th Congress, at the very time that the Fourteenth Amendment was being debated, enacted laws to implement and expedite the administration of the segregated system of public schools.[33] Measures specifically designed to end segregation in the District failed to pass in both the 41st and 42d Congresses.[34]

It is hardly credible that the Congress would have disregarded a limitation that it intended to impose on the states. It is equally incredible that the Congress would have denied negro citizens of the District of Columbia rights that it sought to assure elsewhere in the country.

B. There Is Conclusive Evidence that a Majority of the States in the Union, at the Time of the Adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment, Did Not Contemplate that Its Effect Would Be to Abolish Segregation in the Public Schools.

The Fourteenth Amendment was proposed to the legislatures of the several states by the 39th Congress on the 16th day of June, 1866. On the 21st day of June, 1868, Congress adopted and transmitted to the Department of State a concurrent resolution declaring that "the legislatures of . . . three-fourths and more of the several states of the Union have ratified the Fourteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, duly proposed by two-thirds of each House of the Thirty-ninth Congress." It was therefore resolved, "that the said fourteenth article is hereby declared to be a part of the Constitution of the United States. . . ."

At the time of ratification there were thirty-seven component states in the Union. Of these thirty-seven, thirty had ratified at the time of the promulgation.[32] Three states, Mississippi, Texas and Virginia, later completed ratification. Delaware, Maryland and Kentucky had re-ratification. Delaware, Maryland and Kentucky had rejected the amendment, although Delaware reconsidered and ratified it some thirty years later. Only the legislature of California had taken no action.

To develop a concensus of attitudes of the ratifying legislatures is a task that virtually defies accomplishment. On one hand we have Massachusetts, the home of Charles Sumner; on the other is South Carolina, the birthplace of secession. The group includes Minnesota, with a negro population of less than one-fifth of one percent, and Mississippi, where the negro population included more than fifty-three percent of the total. It is indeed futile to attempt to reconcile the intent and understanding of the legislative bodies in these divergent situations. Furthermore, in evaluating the legislative intent, we must be mindful of the attitudes of the states that had comprised the late Confederacy. Of these eleven, only Tennessee ratified the amendment when it was first submitted. All others rejected it in the first instance, and ratification was later accomplished by reconstruction legislatures which could hardly be described as representative bodies. For these states ratification was a condition precedent to readmission of their representatives to Congress.[33] Certainly, to regain their representation in the national Congress was the main if not the only objective of this group of states. In other states, particularly in the north, where the Republican party was in the ascendancy, ratification was accomplished summarily and without thorough consideration of its meaning. Kansas is typical of these states. In his message to the legislature on January 8, 1867, Governor Crawford commented upon the Fourteenth Amendment as follows:

> "Whilst the foregoing proposed amendment is not fully what I might desire, nor yet, what I be> lieve the times and exigencies demand, yet, in the last canvass, from Maine to California, it was virtually the platform which was submitted to the people; the verdict was unmistakable. The people have spoken on the subject, at the ballot-box, in language which cannot be misunderstood. And as we are but their servants, to do their will, it is now our unquestionable duty to accept it, and give it our cheerful and hearty support. I, therefore, hope that Kansas, in the just legislative enactment of this session will give the unanimous vote of her Legislature in favor of this measure." [34]

33. 14 Stat. 428.

Following the receipt of the amendment, without reference to committee, the Senate ratified the Fourteenth Amendment unanimously and the House vote was 76 to 7.

Under these circumstances it is most difficult to determine the effect that the ratifying states deemed the amendment to have upon public school segregation and other local policies. Our insight in part must come from an analysis of the currents of thought that were prevailing in those states. These have been analyzed in Part I-A of this argument. The other evidence of intent, and indeed the more positive and direct evidence, are the contemporaneous acts and policies of those legislative bodies. Our researches have disclosed that of the 37 states that comprised the Union at the time of adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment, 24 of them maintained legal segregation in the public schools at the time of adoption or subsequent thereto.[35] In 10 states legislation providing for segregated schools was enacted by the same legislatures at the same sessions at which ratification was accomplished. This we deem positive evidence that none of those 24 states considered that segregation was abolished by the Fourteenth Amendment. A further analysis convinces us that in those states where segregation was never practiced or abolished prior to the ratification of the amendment, state and local policies were influenced by local conditions only and bore no relationship to national reconstruction policies. Thus, we conclude that the state legislatures ratifying the Fourteenth Amendment did not understand or contemplate that it would preclude segregation.

The Kansas Understanding

Of the states currently before the Bar of this Court, Kansas is unique in its Abolitionist tradition. Both Virginia and South Carolina were members of the Confederacy. Delaware remained in the Union, but did so reluctantly.[36] Appellants' denunciation of the local customs and statutes in those states as "custom, usage and tradition rooted in the slave tradition" may be apt.[37] Such an accusation, however, cannot be leveled at Kansas. The issues produced by the clash between the Abolitionist and proslavery ideologies had been drawn in Kansas for a decade prior to the civil war, and the abolitionist victory was decisive. Throughout the entire period of reconstruction the Republican party was dominant. Kansas was the home of John Brown, leader of the abortive insurrection at Harper's Ferry. Kansas, in proportion to its population, contributed a larger number of troops to the Union armies than any other loyal state.[38] At the same time it is perhaps significant that Kansas had a substantial negro population—only a little less than ten percent of the total in 1866.[39] Therefore, we proceed to analyze the Kansas experience and attitudes in some detail.

The early history of Kansas is the record of a struggle to assure freedom to the negro. Kansans bitterly opposed the degrading of the negro race by the institution of slavery. They championed negro rights as they conceived them. However, it does not appear that their concept of equality included racial integration in any sphere.

The first territorial legislature of Kansas assembled in 1855. It enacted laws providing for a system of public education.[40] The benefits thereof were restricted to "every class of white citizens between the ages of 5 and 21 years."[41] This perhaps follows from the fact that the territorial legislature of 1855, commonly called the "Bogus Legislature," was elected largely by the votes of Missourians, whose pro-slavery sympathies were accepted. However, at the convention of the Free State party at Big Springs, September 5, 1855, James H. Lane, as chairman of the committee on platform, introduced resolutions declaring in favor of excluding all negroes, both bond and free, from the territory. These resolutions were adopted and incorporated into the "Big Springs Platform," which marked the formal beginning of the Free State party.[42]

The Topeka Constitutional Convention, which met about two months later, gave long discussion on the question of excluding negroes from the full rights of citizenship, resulting in a vote of 45 to 17 in favor of such exclusion. The proposition to exclude all negroes from the state was submitted to the people along with the constitution on December 15, 1855, and was approved by a vote of 1287 to 458.[43]

mon schools accessible to all,[44] the negroes of the territory were largely without educational opportunity. During this period cities were incorporated by special acts of the legislature. These acts defined the cities powers with respect to schools. Illustrative is the act incorporating the city of Marysville.[45] Although the corporation was specifically authorized to maintain a system of public schools, the act provided that nothing therein "shall be so construed as to permit black or mulatto persons to attend said schools or either of them or to receive instruction therein."[46] Provision was made for the appropriation of school taxes paid by negroes to the exclusive purpose of education of the members of the negro race.

Kansas became a state under the Wyandotte constitution, written in 1859. The attitude of that convention was similar to that expressed by earlier assemblies. A resolution to exclude free negroes from the state was laid on the table by a vote of only 26 to 21. The committee on suffrage limited the vote to "every white male citizen." Efforts were made to strike out the word "white." A resolution to that effect was defeated by a vote of 37 to 3.[47] Also in the Wyandotte constitutional convention, numerous attempts were made to restrict all educational privileges to whites. Resolutions were introduced to prohibit colored people from attending the common schools, to exclude them from the universities and to forbid appropriation of any kind for their education. While these measures were defeated, their defeat was not the result of lack of sympathy with such policies. The dominant group apparently did not believe that constitutional restrictions were necessary, their attitude being that such determinations should be left to the legislature and to the people of the several communities within the state. S. A. Kingman, delegate from Brown County and one of the acknowledged Free State leaders, addressed the convention thusly: "I have no hesitancy in saying that if ever a negro family should come into my neighborhood, I should immediately object to their attending school with the children of my neighbors—and I believe that the neighborhood could protect itself. The law does not say they shall ever go to school. It leaves it for the people from time to time to regulate. But more than all, and beyond all, and above all, it does not say that those who choose to go to school with negroes shall not to do so." [48] Blunt, a former resident of Maine, added this:

> "We don't know what will be the peculiar views of the people of Kansas upon this subject before there will be a change of the organic law. There may be a progress made by which the prejudices which involve and surround this question of the admission of negroes or mulattoes to our common schools may be laid aside; and then the Legislature could provide for the education of persons of color." [49]

The state legislature of 1861 enacted a comprehensive system of statutes relating to common schools. Among other powers conferred upon the electors at the annual district meeting was the following: "To make such order as they deem proper for the separate education of white and colored children, securing to them equal educational advantages." [50] This act remained effective until 1876. In 1862, an act relating to cities of the first class (over 7,000) provided for the appropriation of taxes collected from black or mulatto persons to maintain separate schools for negroes.[51] This act was amended in 1865 to provide for equal distribution of the tax burden for public school purposes over all citizens, and, at the same time, to authorize boards of education in such cities to organize and maintain separate schools for the education of white and colored children whenever the educational interests demanded.[52]

It is difficult to determine how many colored children were enrolled in the common schools of Kansas prior to 1867. The reports to the state superintendent were meager and inadequate with no separate statistics for the different races. But, it seems likely that little attention was given to the education of colored children. On February 7, 1863, the editor of the Leavenworth Conservative was remonstrating that there were no free schools for the large colored population in Leavenworth. He advocated a law to compel district trustees to provide for the instruction of colored children in either separate or mixed schools.[53] In 1864, Leavenworth city made provisions for a special school for her colored population—two grades, one primary and one intermediate, were provided with one teacher for each.[54]

In 1866 a move to counteract prejudice against negro education was initiated by the teachers in the public schools. At the meeting of the state teachers association in July it was resolved "that we as teachers use our best endeavors to overcome unreasonable prejudice existing in certain localities against the admission of colored children upon equal terms with the white children as guaranteed by the spirit of the law of our state." On January 18, 1867, the Kansas legislature ratified the Fourteenth Amendment.[56] Within six weeks thereafter the same legislature specifically empowered boards of education in cities of the second class (between 1,000 and 15,000) "to provide separate schools for the education of colored and white children."[57] Thus, in that year segregation became legally possible in all areas of the state. By its earlier acts the legislature had authorized separate schools in cities of the first class and in rural districts. The 1867 act extended this authorization to cities of the second class. With minor amendments these statutes remained effective until 1876.

The 1867 legislature also took definite action to assure educational opportunity to negro children. It provided that when any children are denied admittance to the schools by a board of directors the members of the board would be subject to fine of $100 "for every school month so offending." Those refusing or neglecting to pay the fine might be imprisoned in the county jail.[58] However, this provision was never construed to preclude the maintenance of separate schools of equal facility. Evidence of that fact is found in the almost simultaneous action of the legislature in enacting other legislation, supra, providing for separate schools in cities of the second class.

In 1870, an effort was made to amend the bill to require separate schools for members of different races.[59] The committee to whom the bill was referred recommended its rejection. The following appears in the report of the majority of the committee:

> "According to the provisions of law now in force in this State, the district boards of the several school districts of the State, the trustees and other officers of the boards of education in our cities and villages, having authority in the premises, are authorized to provide separate schools for the education of white and colored children, whenever in their opinion the educational interests intrusted to their care demand the same.

"By the provisions of the bill under consideration, the board of education having authority in the premises are required to establish separate schools for the education of white and colored children.

"We deem the law as it now stands preferable to the bill in this, and also in other particulars, and therefore recommend the rejection of the bill." [60]

This would appear to refute any contention that Chapter 125, Section 1, Laws of 1867, was designed to prohibit segregation. Note, also, the minority report with reference to H. B. 219. In part it states:

"It is a notorious fact that in many districts of the State, the public schools have been broken up and discontinued the moment that an attempt was made to force colored children into such schools with white children, and that in such districts the schools have been discontinued entirely, or replaced by subscription schools. In the former cases both classes of children are deprived of educational advantages; in the latter cases the poorer portion of the white children, and all the colored children are excluded in consequence of their poverty or color, from school, and placed beyond the reach of the liberal provisions of the constitution and laws of the State, which were designed to be equally free to all classes."

60. Proceedings of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Kansas (1870), 661.

Also significant is the view of the chief school administrator for Kansas in the year 1867. In that year the state superintendent reports:

> "The law of the State provides, that the legal voters of a school district 'shall have power to make such order as they may deem proper, for the education of the white and colored children separately, or otherwise, securing to them equal educational advantages.' According to the fair and obvious construction of this law, the schools maintained for colored children must afford equal advantages as to quality of instruction and gradation, as well as in other respects. It will not do to establish a graded school for white children and keep the colored children always in a primary department. It will not do to build fine edifices for the one class and crowd the other into poorly lighted and ill-ventilated rooms. The law secures to each class equal educational advantages.
>
> "If a colored child is in the primary department, he must be allowed to enter with white children, or have provided a separate school equally as good. If a colored pupil is prepared to enter a higher grade, he must either be admitted with white children into that particular grade, or a separate grade equal in all respects must be maintained for his benefit. Such is the law." [61]

Obviously, Superintendent McVicar did not deem separate schools precluded by the action of the legislature in ratifying the Fourteenth Amendment. This, despite the fact that Mr. McVicar did not sympathize with separate schools. Elsewhere in his report he states:

61. 7th Annual Report State Supt. of Pub. Instr., P. McVicar (1867), 50.

> "Why should a small district struggle to maintain separate schools, when the thing is impracticable, and cannot be done without injury to all classes. Why not permit all the children of the community, without distinction of condition or color, to enter our public schools together. . . . And I submit, that the course which I have indicated, is the only course worthy a citizen of Kansas." [62]

In 1876, the school laws of Kansas were codified. For reasons not apparent in the record, all the provisions relating to separation of schools were omitted.[63] It may be significant that at the end of the same year, the superintendent of public instruction in Wyandotte County reported to the state department: "There are a large number of colored pupils in this county, and where they predominate, or attend schools in considerable numbers, these mixed schools are not a success." [64]

In 1878, there occurred a mass migration of former negro slaves from Mississippi and Louisiana to Kansas. Local historians refer to this movement as the "Exodus." In that year the negro population of Kansas substantially increased.[65] Many of these persons settled in the urban communities. In 1879, the legislature enacted new legislation applying to elementary schools in first class cities of the state and authorizing the boards of education to maintain separate schools on that level.[66] This act was amended in 1905 to provide for the maintenance of separate high schools in the city of Kansas City.

The message of Governor Hoch on February 22, 1905, announcing his approval of the 1905 act expresses an attitude then and now characteristic of Kansas officials, and is set out at length:

"No question that has yet come to me in my official capacity has given me so much concern as House bill No. 890, providing for the separation of the whites and blacks in the high school of Kansas City, Kan., and no problem has been more difficult for me to solve satisfactorily to myself than this one. It has seemed to me to be a question vastly more than local, and to involve great moral, educational and racial principles, and incidentally some legal and financial considerations also. My father, though living in the South before the war of the rebellion, was an original and intense abolitionist, and I have believed from boyhood that the black people should have all the rights and privileges under the law enjoyed by the whites. I have watched with increasing admiration and pride the wonderful progress made by this people since the immortal Lincoln made them free. I am in hearty sympathy with them in their great struggle for higher and better things, and in perfect accord with the Roosevelt idea that every man should have a square deal, regardless of race or color. This Kansas City proposition has seemed to me in its general aspects to be a step backward, a concession to the Southern ideas in such matters, with which I have no sympathy whatever; but the local conditions are peculiar, and I have all along believed that it were better for both races in Kansas City, Kan., that the separation proposed in this bill should be made. Under the law in this state in cities of the first class such separation is optional with the boards of education in all grades up to the high school, and the whites and blacks have been separated in all the lower grades in Kansas City, Kan., for years. Without yielding an iota of my conviction in reference to the race problem, with all my sympathies going out to> ward these struggling people, and without sympathy or patience with those who would put a straw in the way of their progress, I have simply come to the conclusion that, under present unfortunate local conditions, the permanent and best interests of whites and blacks alike, in Kansas City, Kan., will be best subserved by permitting this bill to become a law, and in this opinion I seem to be sustained by an overwhelming majority of the people on the ground, as well as by a very large majority of the many able and conservative men with whom I have counseled from other parts of the state."

We dare say that Governor Hoch would have been distressed by the suggestion that his act violated the constitutional rights of the negro citizen.

In 1937, the Kansas legislature again demonstrated its special concern for negro education. An act of that year permitted Kansas City to construct a new high school for colored children, and to issue bonds to finance such construction, "without the necessity of an election" as is required under the general laws of Kansas relating to issuance of bonds of indebtedness by municipal corporations.[67] A sponsor of that bill was a respected negro lawyer of Kansas City who was long a member of the Kansas House of Representatives.

The foregoing suggests two obvious conclusions. Kansas legislators and public officials have repeatedly shown a determination to assure to negro citizens the same educational opportunity that other citizens enjoy. At the same time, they have recognized circumstances where this objective can best be accomplished in separate schools. They have not viewed the Fourteenth Amendment as a deterrent to this effort. This, emphatically, was the attitude of the legislature that ratified the amendment.

II

The Intended Future Effect of the Amendment

A. The Evidence Sustains the Position That Neither the Congress Nor the States Understood That the Fourteenth Amendment Would Empower the Congress, Acting Pursuant to Section 5 Thereof, or the Judiciary in the Light of Future Conditions to Abolish Segregation in the Public Schools.

There is a complete absence of evidence of a contemporary understanding that either the Congress or the Judiciary might at some future date, acting within the powers granted by the Fourteenth Amendment, abolish segregation in the public schools of the state. That the amendment did enlarge the federal power is self-evident. Congress was specifically empowered "to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this Article." The power of the federal courts to give effect to constitutional guarantees, to interpret constitutional provisions, and to apply such provisions to new situations brought within their purview by changed conditions, was firmly embedded in our Constitution long prior to 1866. That these conditions were understood and accepted by the Congress that submitted and the states that ratified the Fourteenth Amendment is apparent.

At the same time, other concepts, equally basic, and equally well understood, both then and now, compel our attention. These principles necessarily were within the understanding of the framers of the Fourteenth Amendment.

> "Each state has all governmental powers save such as the people, by their Constitution, have conferred upon the United States, denied to the states, or reserved to themselves. The federal union is a government of delegated powers." (U. S. v. Butler, 297 U. S. 1 [63].)

BLEED THROUGH

"It (the national government) can neither grant nor secure to its citizens any right or privilege not expressly or by implication placed under its jurisdiction." (U. S. v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 542 [550].)

"The Fourteenth Amendment did not alter the basic relations between the States and the national government." (Screws v. U. S., 325 U. S. 91 [109].)

"The words of the Constitution should be given the meaning they were intended to bear, when that instrument was framed and adopted." (Scott v. Sanford, 19 How. 393.)

"Where the intention of a constitutional provision is clear, there is no room for construction, and no excuse for interpolation or addition." (U. S. v. Sprague, 282 U. S. 716.)

The foregoing statements, illustrative of principles too elementary and too familiar to require comment, undoubtedly were understood to condition the powers delegated to the national government by the Fourteenth Amendment.

In Part I of this argument we sought to demonstrate that neither the framers, the Congress which submitted, nor the states that ratified the Fourteenth Amendment deemed public school segregation to be within the purview of Section 1 thereof. A necessary corollary to this conclusion is that those who were concerned with the adoption of the amendment intended that the education of the people in schools maintained by state taxation should remain within the sphere of state authority. This manifest understanding that the Fourteenth Amendment did not abolish segregation in the public schools and did not bring the schools within the scope of national authority precludes any possibility of an understanding that at some undetermined future time Congress or the Judiciary might without further grant of constitutional authority take from the states this power not intended to be granted. Such a suggestion is repugnant to the basic theory of written constitutions.

> "A cardinal rule in dealing with written instruments is that they are to receive an unvarying interpretation, and that their practical construction is to be uniform. A constitution is not to be made to mean one thing at one time, and another at some subsequent time when the circumstances may have so changed as perhaps to make a different rule in the case seem desirable. A principal share of the benefit expected from written constitutions would be lost if the rules they established were so flexible as to bend to circumstances or be modified by public opinion. It is with special reference to the varying moods of public opinion, and with a view to putting the fundamentals of government beyond their control, that these instruments are framed; and there can be no such steady and imperceptible change in their rules as inheres in the principles of the common law. . . . Public sentiment and action effect such changes, and the courts recognize them; but a court or legislature which should allow a change in public sentiment to influence it in giving to a written constitution a construction not warranted by the intention of its founders, would be justly chargeable with reckless disregard of official oath and public duty; and if its course could become a precedent, these instruments would be of little avail. . . ." (Cooley, Constitutional Limitations, 8th ed. [1927], pp. 123, 124.)

BLEED THROUGH

B. The Emphasis on Congressional Power

If, in spite of evidence to the contrary, it be conceived that the equal protection clause does provide for the abolition of segregation in the public schools, then Congress must so indicate by an exercise of its power under section 5. It is apparent that in the understanding of the framers the emphasis was on congressional action. Ten Broeck notes that "equality, protection, due process, congressional power are the constitutional elements recurrently emphasized . . . in the abolitionist platforms." [1] Fairman also notes this trend. He points out that "the current of thought in 1866 . . . ran strongly in the direction of congressional action. . . . Congress was going to preside over reconstruction." [2] He also mentions the fact that direct application of the several clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment by the Judiciary received no mention. Flack agrees that Congress intended that it would have the right to enact affirmative legislation to implement the policy of the Fourteenth Amendment.[3]

The debates which preceded the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment emphasize this theme. Says Stevens, ". . . The Constitution limits only the action of Congress and is not a limitation on the states. This amendment supplies that defect, and allows Congress to correct the injust legislation of the states." [4] Senator Howard in presenting the amendment said, "The great object of the first section of this amendment is, therefore, to restrain the powers of the states. . . . How will it be done under the present amendment? . . . (It) is done by the fifth section of this amendment which declares that, 'The Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation. . . .'" [5] Representative Bingham, in his last major speech before the House voted on the Amendment, and said "There was a want hereto and there remains a want now, in the Constitution of our Country, which the proposed Amendment will supply. What is that? It is the power in the people, the whole people of the United States, by express authority of the Constitution to do that by Congressional enactment which hitherto they have not had the power to do. . . ." [6]

These statements are only illustrative of the many expressions of the same sentiment. They clearly indicate that the framers intended that the Congress should actively participate in administering the guarantees of the Fourteenth Amendment. This attitude may not have had due consideration in the Slaughterhouse Cases, 16 Wall. 36, and the Civil Rights Cases, 109 U. S. 3.

We do not suggest that it was intended that the judiciary have no function in the interpretation and enforcement of the amendment. Certainly, the courts have a duty in any case to declare those guarantees that are generally recognized and accepted as being within the scope of the amendment. However, when it is sought to extend the federal jurisdiction into those undefined areas on the periphery of equal protection, we believe the framers intended that the Congress and not the courts should supply the impetus.

The fact that it was the intent of the framers that Congress should be the prime mover in this area, suggests that this court might adopt a rule of construction with regard to the Fourteenth Amendment similar to that which it has applied in the commerce cases. In these, a harmonious arrangement has been reached as between national and state power. The states, in the absence of federal action, may enact laws regulating interstate commerce as to matters of local concern, not requiring uniform national control.[7]

The delicate nature of the problem of segregation and the paramount interest of the State of Kansas in preserving the internal peace and tranquility of its people indicates that this is a question which can best be solved on the local level, at least until Congress declares otherwise.

By this latter argument, we do not presume to retreat from our initial position that the Fourteenth Amendment does not bring segregation in the public schools within the national power. However, should the court disagree with our initial position, we then respectfully suggest that the field is one for Congress and not the courts. And until Congress acts, state legislative policy should prevail.

III

To Abolish Segregation in the Public Schools Is Not Within the Judicial Power

The arguments heretofore advanced effectively dispose of this problem. Heretofore we have established the proposition that clearly it was not the contemporary understanding of those in responsible places that the Fourteenth Amendment would of its own force abolish segregation, or that it would otherwise bring the policy of segregation within the purview of the federal power. It was the current understanding and intent that control of the public schools should remain in the states that maintained them. The judicial power can be applied to factual situations existing at the time of the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment only to the extent and in the manner that the framers contemplated.

It is not our intent to disregard the concept of a "living constitution," nor do we deny that changed conditions produce new factual situations and require new interpretations of constitutional provisions. However, it is our view that the present case presents neither a factual situation that did not exist at the time the amendment was adopted, nor a record that reveals a substantial change in the conditions surrounding the situation. It is a fact of history that racial segregation in the public schools was an established pattern in a majority of the states when the amendment was adopted. (See appendix B.) It is equally well established that there were repeated efforts in the Congress, contemporaneous with the adoption of the amendment, to enact legislation prohibiting segregation in the public schools. We deem it significant that most of the arguments here advanced by our adversaries were then urged upon Congress by certain of the abolitionists. The arguments today are basically the same as those offered in support of the Civil Rights Bill of 1875.[1]

1. Cong. Rec., 43d Cong. 1st Sess. 4115-4116 (1874).

BLEED THROUGH

Thus, the record discloses neither new facts nor changed conditions. We have the same problem, the same arguments. To be sure, there is a variation in the language employed, and to the record has been added the somewhat speculative conclusions of a few individuals whose own assertion is that their theses are "admittedly on the frontiers of scientific knowledge." [2] We feel that this court would be going far beyond the limits of the judicial power if, on the basis of such a record, it should reverse the trend of nearly ninety years and strike down a state statute that during all those years has been universally deemed a proper exercise of legislative power. It is not within the province of the federal judiciary to legislate, particularly beyond the limits of the federal constitution.

One more consideration militates against the judicial power. In Part II-B of this Argument we pointed out the framers' emphasis on congressional rather than judicial action to implement the amendment. The Congress and not the courts was intended to define the guarantees of section 1 and give them meaning. Thus, we suggest that in the light of that original understanding the re-definition of equal protection must be a legislative rather than a judicial function.

Appellants appear to seek to re-argue Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537, and the questions presented to the Court in the original briefs. We do not deem it necessary to again go over that ground. For us, the Plessy case and Gong Lum v. Rice, 275 U. S. 78, are "directly in point, and absolutely controlling." Briggs v. Elliott, 98 Fed. Supp. 529.

> "Were this a new question, it would call for very full argument and consideration; but we think that it is the same question which has been many times decided to be within the constitutional power of > the state legislatures to settle, without intervention of the federal courts under the federal constitution." (Gong Lum v. Rice, supra.)

2. Appendix to Appellants' Brief, No. 8, October Term, 1952, p. 18.

Appellants urge that the inescapable conclusion of Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629, and McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U. S. 637, is that the separate but equal doctrine be overthrown. Such has not been the view of this Court.

In the Sweatt case the Court specifically announced:

> "Nor need we reach the petitioner's contention that Plessy v. Ferguson should be re-examined in the light of contemporary knowledge respecting the purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment and the effects of racial segregation." (p. 636.)

Finally, in disposing of this question, we are constrained again to refer to the statement of Chief Judge Parker in Briggs v. Elliott, supra. We know of no comment more apt:

> "To this we may add that, when seventeen states and the Congress of the United States have for more than three-quarters of a century required segregation of the races in the public schools, and when this has received the approval of the leading appellate courts of the country including the unanimous approval of the Supreme Court of the United States at a time when that court included Chief Justice Taft and Justices Stone, Holmes and Brandeis, it is a late day to say that such segregation is violative of fundamental constitutional rights. It is hardly reasonable to suppose that legislative bodies over so wide a territory, including the Congress of the United States, and great judges of high courts have knowingly defied the Constitution for so long a period or that they have acted in ignorance of the meaning of its provisions. The constitutional principle is the same now that it has been throughout this period; and if conditions have changed so that segregation is no longer wise, this is a matter for the legislatures and not for the courts. The members of the judiciary have no more right to read their ideas of sociology into the Constitution than their ideas of economics."

IV

Kansas Communities, Through the Normal Processes of Local Government, Are Effectually Accomplishing Desegregation of Their Public Schools

The justification for the exercise of federal jurisdiction to determine local policy in local affairs is that the states fail or refuse to effect the proper policy. The appellants argue that the purpose of segregation is to perpetuate the inferior status of negroes and to organize the community upon the basis of a white supremacy.[1] We suggest that the experience in Kansas indicates another conclusion.

We grant that segregation may not be the ethical or political ideal. At the same time we recognize that practical considerations may prevent realization of the ideal. Those considerations vary from time to time and from place to place. In recognition of these facts, the Kansas legislature provided for an exercise of local autonomy. The statute merely authorizes, but does not require, boards of education in cities of over 15,000 population, to maintain separate schools for the elementary grades.[2]

Twelve cities of the state come within its provisions. Of those twelve, only one, Hutchinson, has never maintained segregated schools. As recently as 1950 separate elementary schools were maintained in eleven cities of the state, with aggregate enrollments in excess of 70,000 students. In September, 1952, the city of Pittsburg abandoned a policy of segregation that had existed since 1913. At the same time the city of Wichita concluded a process of desegregation that had extended over a period of two years, affecting some 25,000 children, approximately 8% of whom were colored. The city of Lawrence presently maintains a school system less than one-

2. The present extent of segregated schools in Kansas is shown in Appendix D.

BLEED THROUGH

third segregated. At the outset of this brief we called attention to the resolution of the Board of Education of the City of Topeka, dated September 3, 1953, stating its intention to abandon segregation at the earliest practicable date, and to its first affirmative step in that direction. On September 12, 1953, the Board of Education of the City of Atchison adopted a resolution with a similar effect.

Thus, in step with the changing inter-racial attitudes and the growing spirit of inter-racial co-operation, the people of Kansas, pursuant to our statute and through the normal process of local government, are abandoning the policy of segregation whenever local conditions and local attitudes make it feasible. We submit that this is a more wholesome process than to accomplish the same result by the coercive decrees of federal courts. We submit that, more than any other, this process is consistent with the historic intent and purpose of our Constitution.

V

The Appropriate Decree

Finally, we are requested to discuss the characteristics of the decree that should be entered in event the Court should reach the improbable conclusion that racial segregation in the public schools per se is violative of constitutional rights. With respect to these questions, the Appellee Board of Education has filed its separate brief herein, setting out its views in detail and calling attention to certain local conditions that would be affected by such a decree.

Inasmuch as the abolishment of the policy of segregation would require no change in state policy, and in view of the fact that Appellee Board of Education has discussed these questions fully in its separate brief, detailed comment by us is not necessary. We recognize, however, that other communities of Kansas would necessarily be affected by the consequences of a decree abolishing segregation, and for that reason we offer the following general views, based on our knowledge of conditions prevailing in Kansas:

We do not believe that the reversal of the judgment of the court below would necessarily require admission of Negro children forthwith to the schools of their choice. On the contrary, we believe that the Court in the exercise of its equity powers may permit an effective gradual adjustment. We think that the necessity for safeguarding the integrity of the school system at large must be reconciled with the necessity of effecting constitutional guaranties. We feel that any order that might currently disrupt the orderly conduct of the public school system would not be consistent with a proper exercise of equity jurisdiction.

It is our further view that this Court should not undertake to formulate a detailed decree in this case. Should it deem the judgment of the court below to be improper, we suggest that that judgment should simply be reversed and the cause remanded to that court with directions to frame an appropriate decree. In the preparation of such a decree the District Court might properly conduct such investigations and hearings as are necessary to apprise itself of the various interests to be reconciled. However, that is a problem that should be determined on the local level by the court of original jurisdiction. We can assure this Court that the State of Kansas and its local boards of education will act in complete good faith to comply with the letter and the spirit of any decree that may be entered.

BLEED THROUGH

Conclusion

For the reasons heretofore set forth, Appellee, the State of Kansas, again respectfully submits that the judgment of the court below should be affirmed.

APPENDIX B

The States, the Fourteenth Amendment and Segregation

1. Introduction

On the 16th day of July, 1866, the Fourteenth Amendment was proposed by the Thirty-ninth Congress to the legislatures of the several states. Thirty-seven states comprised the Union at the time ratification was proclaimed on July 28, 1867. Of those thirty-seven the legislatures of thirty had adopted resolutions ratifying the amendment by the date of proclamation. Three states were to complete ratification within the next two years.[1] Three other states had finally rejected the amendment and were not again to consider it during the period of reconstruction.[2] Only the legislature of California had neither ratified nor rejected the amendment. Of the thirty-three states ratifying the amendment, ten had initially rejected it,[3] while subsequent to ratification the legislatures of three states adopted resolutions withdrawing their assent.[4]

Few records of legislative debates on propositions to ratify the Fourteenth Amendment are available. Those documents that do exist contain no evidence that any of the ratifying legislatures contemplated or understood that the Fourteenth Amendment would abolish segregation in the public schools. Indeed, statements relating to the public schools are rare and the few comments that appear in the legislative journals are general and inconclusive. We believe that the best evidence (perhaps the only competent evidence) of the attitudes of state legislatures toward the relationship of the Fourteenth Amendment to racial segregation in the public schools may be found in their contemporaneous acts. Thus we examine specifically the provisions of the laws relating to segregation in the public schools found in the constitutions and statute books of the component states of the Union at the time the Fourteenth Amendment was proposed and ratified.

2. Analysis

ALABAMA. On December 6, 1866, the Governor of Alabama recommended that the legislature ratify the Fourteenth Amendment in order that Alabama congressmen might be seated in the federal Congress. Nevertheless, on the next day the House and Senate of Alabama jointly refused to ratify the amendment.[1] The amendment was again submitted to the reconstruction legislature of Alabama and was ratified by it on July 13, 1868.[2]

Prior to the civil war the problem of segregation in public schools did not exist in Alabama, for the reason that statutory penalties were provided for persons who undertook to teach negroes.[3] It is significant that the legislature of 1868, which ratified the Fourteenth Amendment, also enacted legislation providing for segregation in the public schools.[4] This statute required segregated schools unless all parents in the district consented to integration. The constitution of Alabama, adopted in 1875, provides for separate but equal facilities for children of citizens of African descent.[5] Since that date, legal segregation has been maintained in Alabama. The present constitution provides for separate schools for white and colored races and specifically requires that "no child of either race shall be permitted to attend the school of the other race."[6]

ARKANSAS. The legislature of Arkansas rejected the Fourteenth Amendment on December 17, 1866.[1] The amendment was again submitted to the reconstruction military legislature of Arkansas and was ratified on April 6, 1868.[2] Arkansas was the only state which ratified an amendment by a unanimous vote of both its legislative bodies.[3] The legislature that ratified the amendment on July 23, 1868, enacted laws to establish a public school system which directed the state agency responsible for schools to "make the necessary provisions for establishing separate schools for white and colored children."[4] Arkansas maintains segregated schools at the present time.[5]

CALIFORNIA. California neither ratified nor rejected the Fourteenth Amendment. However, both prior and subsequent to incorporation of the Amendment into the Constitution of the United States, racially segregated public schools were permitted in California.[1] Statutes providing especially for racially segregated schools were enacted by the California legislature of 1863, 1864, 1866 and 1870.[2]

CONNECTICUT. Connecticut was the first state to ratify the Fourteenth Amendment. The ratification was completed on June 30, 1866.[1] Prior to 1866, segregated schools may have been maintained in Connecticut. However, the same legislature that ratified the Fourteenth Amendment prohibited segregation in public schools on account of race or color.[2] There is no record of legal segregation in Connecticut during or subsequent to the reconstruction period.

However, negroes were not permitted to vote until the Fifteenth Amendment to the federal constitution made the Connecticut constitutional provision unoperative.[3]

DELAWARE. The Fourteenth Amendment was rejected by the legislature of Delaware in 1867.[1] The amendment was not ratified by the state of Delaware until more than thirty years thereafter. Public schools for negro children were not provided in Delaware until after the civil war. In 1881 the first direct appropriation from the state treasury was made for the maintenance of negro schools.[2] The constitution of 1897, which is presently effective, provides for the maintenance of separate but equal school facilities in Delaware for children of different races.[3] This provision was effective when the legislature of 1901 finally ratified the Fourteenth Amendment.

FLORIDA. Pursuant to the recommendation of its Governor, the legislature of Florida unanimously rejected the Fourteenth Amendment in December, 1866.[1] Eighteen months later under pressure of the reconstruction act, Florida adopted a new constitution and the Fourteenth Amendment was ratified on June 9, 1868.[2] At the time of reconstruction, Florida apparently did not maintain a free public school system for white students although public funds had been appropriated for the education of negroes.[3] Research indicates that segregation in the public schools was not established by law in Florida until the constitution of 1887 became effective.[4] Although specific provision was not made, segregation was in fact practiced widely prior to 1887. Since that time there has always been segregation of races in the public schools of Florida.[5]

GEORGIA. The Fourteenth Amendment was presented to the legislature of Georgia on November 1, 1866, and was subsequently rejected by both houses of the legislature.[1] The amendment was submitted to the provisional legislature of Georgia and was ratified in July, 1868.[2] This ratification was not accepted by Congress, inasmuch as negroes had been excluded from their seats in the 1868 legislature. Therefore, the amendment was again submitted to the 1879 session and was ratified.[3] It is significant that the session of 1870, which effectively ratified the Fourteenth Amendment, also enacted a law providing a system of public schools for Georgia.[4] This act specifically provided ". . . the children of the white and colored races shall not be taught together in any sub-district of the State." An effort to eliminate this provision in the House of Representatives failed.[5] The present constitution and laws of Georgia provide for segregation in the public schools.[6]

ILLINOIS. The Fourteenth Amendment was ratified by the Illinois legislature in January, 1867.[1] Prior to the civil war, no system of public education was maintained for students of other than the white race. However, segregation was not specifically forbidden by the laws of Illinois prior to 1874.[2] The report of the state superintendent of public instruction of Illinois for the year 1865-66 indicates that while there were at that time about 6,000 negroes of school age in Illinois, the statutes then effective excluded them from participation in the benefits of the free school system.[3] The report of the same officer for the next biennium recommends the repeal of the provision limiting public school facilities to pupils of the white race. However, with respect to segregation the same report says:

> "The question of co-attendance, or of separate schools, is an entire and distinct one and may safely be left to be determined by the respective districts and communities, to suit themselves. In many places there will be but one school for all; in many others there will be separate schools. This is a matter of little importance, and one which need not and cannot be regulated by the legislature." [4]

INDIANA. Indiana is one of the two states wherein a full record of legislative debates on the Fourteenth Amendment is available. Governor Morton in delivering his message to the legislature of Jan. 11, 1867, pointed out that the laws of Indiana then excluded colored children from the common schools and made no provision for their education. He suggested that an enumeration of the colored children of the state be made and that a portion of the school fund in proportion to their number be set apart and applied to their education by the establishment of separate schools. He further stated,

> "I would not recommend that white children and colored children be placed together in the same schools, believing, as I do, that in the present state of public opinion, that to do so would create dissatisfaction and conflict and impair the usefulness of the schools . . ." [1]

In the same message, Governor Morton recommended passage of the Fourteenth Amendment. The amendment was ratified on January 29, 1867, by substantial majorities in each of the houses.[2] As had been pointed out in the Governor's message, the Indiana school laws then made no provision for education of negroes. However, pursuant to legislation enacted in 1865, negroes and mulattoes were excused from payment of the school tax.[3] There were no amendments to the school laws in the 1867 session. In 1869, taxation for common school purposes was extended to all persons otherwise liable, and the education of negro children was provided for in separate schools.[4] Debates on this measure do not indicate that any of the legislators considered the Fourteenth Amendment an impediment to the establishment of separate schools.[5] Further legislation providing for separate schools was enacted by the legislature of 1877.[6] This act continued in effect until it was specifically repealed in 1949.[7]

Iowa. Iowa ratified the Fourteenth Amendment on April 3, 1868.[1] Ten years before the legislature had authorized district boards to provide separate schools for the education of colored children "except in cases where by the unanimous consent of the persons sending to the school in the sub-district, they may be permitted to attend with the white youth."[2] This statute was held by the Supreme Court of Iowa to violate the constitution of that state.[3] But that opinion reveals no objections made with reference to the Fourteenth Amendment or any part of the Constitution of the United States. Iowa has not maintained segregated schools since that time.

KANSAS. The Fourteenth Amendment was recommended for passage by Governor Samuel J. Crawford on January 8, 1867, on the ground that while the amendment was not fully what the Governor might desire, it had received the approval of the electors at the preceding general election.[1] Without reference to committee and apparently without debate the resolution for ratification of the amendment was adopted by both houses of the legislature, said ratification being completed on January 18, 1867.[2] It is significant that at the time the amendment was ratified segregation was authorized by the statutes of Kansas.[3] Indeed, the legislature which ratified the Fourteenth Amendment almost simultaneously enacted legislation specifically authorizing segregation in cities of the second class.[4] In 1876 the statutes authorizing separate schools were repealed but three years later an act was passed specifically empowering boards of education in cities of the first class to maintain separate schools. This section remains substantially unchanged.[5]

KENTUCKY. The Kentucky legislature, pursuant to recommendation of its Governor, rejected the Fourteenth Amendment in January, 1867.[1] There is no indication in the legislative journals that the amendment was ever again considered in the state of Kentucky. The same year the legislature enacted laws permitting the establishment of schools for negroes to be supported by taxes collected from negroes.[2] The fact appears, however, that no effective system of negro education existed prior to 1882, in which year the legislature merged white and negro schools into a seg-

LOUISIANA. The Governor of Louisiana recommended ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment in his message to the legislature of 1867. He also recommended separate schools for negro children in the same message.[1] However, the Fourteenth Amendment was unanimously rejected by both houses.[2] Reconstruction brought a new provisional governor and a new legislature, composed principally of negroes. Upon recommendation of the Governor, the resolution to ratify the amendment was overwhelmingly adopted in both houses of the legislature and ratification completed on July 9, 1868.[3] The same year a new constitution of Louisiana provided that there should be no segregation in the public schools.[4] It appears that no effective school system was established while this constitution was in effect.[5] In 1879 the constitutional requirement for mixed schools was eliminated, but since that time, segregated schools have been mandatory in Louisiana.[6]

MAINE. The Fourteenth Amendment was ratified by the legislature of Maine upon recommendation of the Governor, and with only two dissenting votes in the entire legislature, on January 19, 1867.[1] There is no evidence that segregation was ever practiced in the public schools of Maine or in the other public facilities of the state. ever, miscegenation was prohibited by the statutes of Maine as late as 1875.[2]

MARYLAND. The legislature of Maryland considered and rejected the Fourteenth Amendment in March, 1867.[1] There is no record that any further action on the amendment was ever taken by Maryland. Public facilities for negro education were non-existent in that state prior to the submission of the Fourteenth Amendment. The first general public school system was established in Maryland by a law effective April 1, 1868. That statute provided for free schools open to all white children between the ages of 6 and 18 years. Further provision was made that taxes paid for school purposes by colored taxpayers should be set aside for the purpose of maintaining schools for colored children.[2] Segregation has continued in the public schools of Maryland until the present day.[3]

MASSACHUSETTS. The Governor of Massachusetts addressed the legislature on January 4, 1867, and recommended ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment.[1] A review of that message does not reflect any expression of attitude on the part of the Governor relative to separate schools. Segregated education, although formerly practiced in the city of Boston, had been prohibited by statute in Massachusetts since 1855.[2] Pursuant to the recommendation of the Governor, the amendment was ratified by both houses of the Massachusetts legislature on March 20, 1867.[3] There is no evidence in the record to indicate whether Massachusetts did or did not consider the relationship of the Fourteenth Amendment to a segregated system of public schools.

MICHIGAN. The Fourteenth Amendment was somewhat summarily ratified by the Michigan legislature on February 15, 1867.[1] Separate schools for negroes existed in the city of Detroit as early as 1839 and continued until after the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment. In 1867, the legislature provided that "All residents of any district shall have an equal right to attend any school therein . . ."[2] This statute was found to preclude segregation when placed in issue before the Supreme Court of Michigan.[3] However, the Court was apparently oblivious to any possible relationship of the Fourteenth Amendment to segregation. Miscegenation was prohibited in Michigan as early as 1846 and continued until 1883.[4]

MINNESOTA. The Governor recommended ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment and both houses of the legislature approved ratification by overwhelming majorities in January, 1867.[1] Ratification was completed on February 1. At that time Minnesota had fewer than one thousand negro residents; therefore, there is little reason to believe that the matter of negro segregation was considered by the Governor and the legislature at the time of ratification. There is no history of segregation in Minnesota.

MISSISSIPPI. The Fourteenth Amendment was first presented to the legislature of Mississippi in 1867. Disapproval was recommended by the Governor and both houses of the legislature unanimously voted for rejection.[1] The amendment was again submitted to the reconstruction legislature of 1870, along with the Fifteenth Amendment. Both were ratified.[2] Constitutional and statutory provisions of Mississippi at the time of ratification did not specifically require or permit segregation by races. However, the evidence is abundant that segregation was almost universally practiced in Mississippi during this period.[3] School segregation has been specifically required by the laws of Mississippi since 1878.

MISSOURI. Missouri ratified the Fourteenth Amendment on January 26, 1867. Its ratification was recommended by the Governor and adopted by substantial majorities of both houses in that month.[1] No reference to the schools is found in these proceedings. At the time of ratification Missouri permitted establishment of separate schools for negroes under its constitution of 1865.[2] In 1875 the constitution required separate schools for children of African descent.[3] Statutory provisions relative to segregation in the public schools were enacted in Missouri in 1865, 1868, 1869, 1874, 1879, 1887 and 1895.

NEBRASKA. Nebraska was admitted to the Union in 1867 and on June 15 of that year ratified the Fourteenth Amendment.[1] Apparently there has never been legal authority for the maintenance of a segregated school system in Nebraska, nor is segregation authorized by law in other areas of life. However, the statutes of Nebraska prohibit the marriage of white persons with persons of one-eighth or more of negro, Japanese or Chinese blood.[2]

NEVADA. The legislature of Nevada ratified the Fourteenth Amendment on January 22, 1867.[1] Ratification had been urged by the Governor in his message. At the same time he had mentioned the failure of the state of Nevada to provide education for negro students and suggested that such failure violated the constitution of the state of Nevada.[2] In 1867 the legislature that ratified the Fourteenth Amendment enacted legislation providing

> "Negroes, Mongolians, and Indians shall not be admitted into the public schools, but the board of trustees may establish a separate fund for their education and use the public school funds for the support of the amendment."[3]

In 1872 the Supreme Court of Nevada held that the school trustees could not legally deny to any resident person of proper age an equal participation in the benefits of the common schools.[4] However, the holding is based entirely on provisions of the Nevada constitution and not upon the Fourteenth Amendment. Furthermore, the opinion apparently permits the school trustees to make any appropriate classification of students with reference to existing conditions including separation of races. The fact that the Nevada Supreme Court did not consider the Fourteenth Amendment applicable to school segregation is indicated by the following excerpt in the dissenting opinion in the Duffey case:

> "The case of relator was sought to be maintained on the ground that the statute was in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment to the constitution of the U. S. I fully agree with my associates that this proposal of counsel is utterly untenable."

Hampshire did not then, and does not now, maintain segregation in the public schools or elsewhere. However, in 1870 there were fewer than five hundred negroes in the entire state.

NEW JERSEY. The Fourteenth Amendment was ratified in New Jersey at an extra session of the legislature on September 11, 1866. The amendment was presented and ratification accomplished in two days.[1] However, in 1868 the legislature of New Jersey adopted a resolution rescinding ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment.[2]

It appears that at no time has segregation by race been established by law in the public schools of New Jersey, although segregation has been practiced in fact in a few New Jersey communities. In 1881 the New Jersey legislature specifically prohibited exclusion from the public schools on the ground of color.[3] However, a separate state manual training school for negro children, established in 1894, existed as late as 1910.[4]

NEW YORK. The Fourteenth Amendment as proposed by Congress was ratified in New York on January 10, 1867.[1] Separate schools had long existed in the state of New York. In 1864 a statute authorizing local authorities to establish separate schools for negroes was enacted as part of the general school law.[2] There is evidence that in 1867 separate schools for negroes were actually maintained in New York City and in Brooklyn. Various statutes of New York, upholding the establishment of separate schools for negroes, have been upheld against objections on constitutional grounds in numerous cases before the Supreme Court of New York.[3] This record of litigation indicates that segregation was widely practiced in New York during the period subsequent to the ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment until as recently as 1900.

North Carolina. North Carolina, like the other states of the confederacy, rejected the Fourteenth Amendment when it was first submitted to the legislature of that state on November 19, 1866.[1] The provisional governor recommended ratification to the reconstruction legislature of 1868 and such ratification was accomplished on July 4 of that year.[2] Simultaneously, North Carolina adopted a new constitution. This constitution of 1868 provided for segregated education.[3] Two days after the Fourteenth Amendment was ratified, the Governor of North Carolina in his inaugural address stated: "It is believed to be better for both races and more satisfactory to both, that the schools should be distinct and separate." Less than two weeks after the amendment was ratified the House and Senate adopted a joint resolution stating that it was the duty of the joint assembly to adopt a system of free schools but that the races should be segregated.[4] The same year the legislature, pursuant to a recommendation by the Governor, enacted Chapter 184 of the North Carolina Laws of 1868-9, which provides: "The school authorities of each and every township shall establish a separate school or separate schools for the instruction of children and youth of each race. . . ."

did not refer to the relationship of the Fourteenth Amendment to segregation in the public schools, a policy maintained by Ohio at that time. Ratification was accomplished on January 11, 1867.[1] However, in the following year a resolution rescinding ratification was passed by both houses of the legislature.[2] Ohio had long maintained separate schools for negroes under various constitutional and statutory provisions. A statute establishing common schools for negroes was enacted as early as 1831.[3] By 1860 separate schools for negro children were required when there were more than thirty children in the school districts.[4] Segregation was not prohibited by statute until 1887.[5] Pursuant to the authority conferred by statute, separate schools were maintained for negro children in more than half of the counties of Ohio.[6] Such schools were attacked as contrary to the Fourteenth Amendment in 1871 but the Supreme Court of Ohio found that such separate systems did not contravene the provisions of that amendment.[7]

OREGON. Ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment was accomplished in Oregon on September 19, 1866.[1] However, on October 15, 1868, the legislature adopted a resolution to rescind its ratification of the amendment.[2] In view of the fact that there were few negroes in Oregon at this time (346 in 1870) it is doubtful if the legislature entertained any concept of the relationship of the Fourteenth Amendment to segregation in the public schools. We note, however, that in 1866 Oregon enacted a statute

PENNSYLVANIA. Pennsylvania ratified the Fourteenth Amendment on February 13, 1867.[1] While debates on the amendment were preserved in Pennsylvania, there appears to have been no reference to the relationship between the Fourteenth Amendment and segregation in the public schools. At that time, legislation in Pennsylvania required separate schools to be established for negroes in those districts when twenty or more pupils were available.[2] Such segregation was actually practiced in Pennsylvania and was upheld when attacked on constitutional grounds in 1873.[3] The practice continued until 1881 when it was abolished by statute.[4] There is no other evidence of legal segregation in Pennsylvania, subsequent to the enactment of the Fourteenth Amendment.

RHODE ISLAND. On February 7, 1867, the legislature of Rhode Island ratified the Fourteenth Amendment.[1] Although school segregation had existed prior to 1865 in certain communities in Rhode Island, there is no evidence that it was practiced in Rhode Island with sanction of law at the time of ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment or at any time subsequent thereto.

SOUTH CAROLINA. South Carolina considered the Fourteenth Amendment in November, 1866. The Governor in his message to the legislature transmitting the amendment recommended rejection.[1] In the legislature only one member voted in favor of ratification.[2] The reconstruction government of South Carolina adopted a new constitution in 1868. That constitution required the legislature, immediately after its organization, to ratify the Fourteenth Amendment.[3] Apparently the move was prompted by a consciousness that the ratification of the amendment was a prerequisite to readmission to the Union.[4] The constitution further required that the general assembly establish a system of free schools "free and open to all the children and youths in the state, without regard to race or color."[5] The Fourteenth Amendment was ratified in July, 1868.[6] Despite ratification and despite the provision in the new constitution of South Carolina, requiring a system of amalgamated schools, a recommendation against this practice was made by Governor Orr in his message to the legislature on July 8, 1868. Two days later the new Governor, Robert K. Scott, formerly of Maine and formerly Brigadier General in the Union Army, expressed his views on segregation. Governor Scott said:

> "I respectfully recommend that the General Assembly will provide by law for the establishment of at least two schools in each school district when necessary and that one of said schools shall be set apart and designated as a school for colored children and the other for white children, the school fund to be distributed equally to each class, proportionate to the number of children between the ages of six and sixteen years. I deem this separation of the two races in the public schools as a matter of greatest importance to all classes of our people. . . . It is the declared design of the constitution that all classes of our people shall be educated, but not to provide for this separation of the two races will be to repel the masses of whites from the educational training they so much need, and virtually to give to our colored population the exclusive benefit of our public schools."[7]

The record further indicates that the legislature of 1870 passed a statute providing a general system of public education. A negro was appointed the first superintendent of public instruction. Despite this fact, there was no real effort made on the part of the reconstruction government of South Carolina to require amalgamated schools in that state. A review of legislative debates and discussions and other assemblies during this period does not reveal any evidence that the persons and leadership in South Carolina deemed the Fourteenth Amendment to prohibit the principle of segregated schools.

TENNESSEE. Ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment was accomplished in Tennessee on July 19, 1866.[1] We note that the legislature that ratified the Fourteenth Amendment amended the school law on March 5, 1867, to require segregated education in Tennessee.[2] This act was described by the Republican Governor as a wise and desirable school law. A requirement for segregated schools was written into the Tennessee Constitution in 1870.[3] Schools remain segregated in Tennessee at the present time.[4]

TEXAS. The legislature of Texas rejected the Fourteenth Amendment on November 1, 1866.[1] The reconstruction legislature of Texas ratified the amendment February 18, 1870.[2] There is no record that schools were discussed in connection with either of these proceedings. The Texas constitution of 1866 provided that school taxes levied on negroes should be appropriated for use of negro schools.[3] However, this constitution was not acceptable to Congress and, therefore, another constitution was drafted in 1869.

This later constitution provided for a free school system but did not mention segregation. Texas was re-admitted to representation in Congress by an act dated March 30, 1870. This statute stated that the Texas constitution should not be amended: "To deprive any citizen or class of citizens in the United States of school rights or privileges secured by the constitution of said state." [4] The same legislature enacted laws empowering boards of directors of public school districts "when, in their opinion, the harmony and success of the school require it," to "make any separation of the students or school necessary to assure success, so as not to deprive any student or students of scholastic benefits . . ." [5] A committee report made in connection with such legislation makes it clear that the purpose of this provision was to authorize segregation to be maintained on a local basis.[6] Segregated schools were required by the constitution of 1876 and schools have remained segregated in Texas ever since.[7]

VERMONT. Pursuant to recommendation of Governor Dillingham, the Vermont legislature ratified the Fourteenth Amendment on October 23, 1866.[1] The proceedings in connection with ratification revealed no evidence of the attitude of legislators toward the question of segregation. Vermont apparently had never had segregated schools.

VIRGINIA. In spite of Governor Pierpont's recommendation, the legislature of Virginia refused to ratify the Fourteenth Amendment when it was initially submitted in 1867.[1] The government of Virginia was then reorganized pursuant to the reconstruction acts of Congress and a new constitution was adopted in 1869. The reconstruction governor urged ratification, saying that there was no satisfactory alternative.[2] The constitution of 1869 had directed the legislature at its first session to establish a system of free schools. The legislature, which was the same legislature that ratified the Fourteenth Amendment, promptly proceeded to do so and specifically required "White and colored persons shall not be taught in the same schools but in separate schools." [3] While this bill was under consideration, efforts were made to strike out the provision requiring segregation and to substitute permissive segregation for the mandatory provision contained in the bill. Both of these propositions were decisively defeated.[4]

WEST VIRGINIA. West Virginia completed ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment after a summary consideration on January 16, 1867.[1] On February 27, 1867, six weeks later, the same legislature adopted a statute providing that: "White and colored persons shall not be taught in the same schools." [2] Segregation had existed by law in West Virginia many years prior to the civil war.

WISCONSIN. Wisconsin ratified the Fourteenth Amendment on February 7, 1867.[1] The proceedings in connection with the ratification of the amendment contain no mention of public schools. Wisconsin has apparently never had racial segregation in this area of public activity.

3. Summary and Conclusion

A. States where segregation existed with legislative or constitutional sanction contemporaneous with and/or subsequent to adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment:

Alabama	Mississippi
Arkansas	Missouri
California	Nevada
Delaware	New York
Florida	North Carolina
Georgia	Ohio
Illinois	Pennsylvania
Indiana	South Carolina
Kansas	Tennessee
Kentucky	Texas
Louisiana	Virginia
Maryland	West Virginia

B. States in which laws authorizing or requiring segregation were passed by the same legislatures that ratified the Fourteenth Amendment:

Alabama	North Carolina
Arkansas	Tennessee
Georgia	Texas
Kansas	Virginia
Nevada	West Virginia

C. States where segregation has not been authorized by state law since the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment:

Connecticut	New Hampshire
Iowa	New Jersey
Maine	Oregon
Massachusetts	Rhode Island
Michigan	Vermont
Minnesota	Wisconsin
Nebraska

We deem the foregoing positive evidence that the legislatures of twenty-four states neither understood nor contemplated that the Fourteenth Amendment would abolish segregation in the public schools. On the other hand, we challenge the appellants to demonstrate by competent evidence that the legislatures of any of the thirteen remaining states contemplated or understood that the amendment would preclude racial segregation in the public schools. Our analysis of the public documents of those states indicates that the impact of the Fourteenth Amendment upon the policy of segregation was simply never considered, for the reason that such a policy had never existed or had been abandoned for reasons of local policy. The absence of such policies in those states is readily explained by reference to the federal census of 1870 which shows their average negro population to be less than one percent of the total.

BRIEF FOR THE BOARD OF EDUCATION, TOPEKA, KANSAS, ON QUESTIONS PROPOUNDED BY THE COURT.

I.

STATEMENT

This brief is filed in response to the order of the Court, entered June 8, 1953, propounding five questions on which briefs were requested. Since the date of that order the Topeka Board of Education on September 3, 1953, duly adopted the following resolution:

> "Be it resolved that it is the policy of the Topeka Board of Education to terminate maintenance of segregation in the elementary schools as rapidly as is practicable.";

and on September 8, 1953, it passed a motion, ". . . that segregation be terminate in the Southwest and Randolph Schools this year . . .". Prior to the adoption of said resolution the Board of Education maintained twenty separate elementary schools for white children, each of which schools was attended by white children residing within a limited geographic area or boundaries near the school, and it also maintained four separate schools for negro children with large area or district boundaries. Negro students living some distance from school were furnished transportation to and from school if they requested it.

Since September 8, 1953, negro children living within the area boundaries of the Southwest School and the Randolph School are assigned to and are attending those schools along with and equally with white children. The Board is still maintaining the four separate negro schools and eighteen separate white schools.

By reason of its having resolved to terminate segregation in the elementary schools of Topeka "as rapidly as is practicable," the Topeka Board of Education no longer has an actual interest in the controversy over the constitutionality of segregation in such schools, and it therefore prefers to refrain from arguing and briefing Questions 1, 2, and 3 as propounded by the Court, which are directed to the constitutional questions involved.

The Board of Education of Topeka is, however, actually and directly interested in Questions 4 and 5 as propounded by the Court. Briefly summarized, we contend;

First, That termination of segregation in the elementary schools of Topeka will involve difficult and far reaching administrative decisions, affecting nearly all school children, nearly all teachers, and nearly all school buildings, so that to attempt to accomplish it in a hurried or summary manner will be both impossible and impractical.

Second, The public interest, including the interest of negro children in Topeka, equity, and practical considerations require that termination of segregation in the elementary schools of Topeka shall be permitted to be accomplished in a gradual and orderly manner.

BLEED THROUGH

II.

QUESTION 4(a) SHOULD BE ANSWERED IN THE NEGATIVE: AND QUESTION 4(b) IN THE AFFIRMATIVE.

Both Questions 4 (a) and 4 (b) contemplate the possibility that this Court might issue a broad, general order requiring abolition of segregation in the elementary schools of Topeka, rather than a limited order relating to the rights of the few particular negro children who are parties to this suit.

Such a general order would necessitate almost a complete readjustment of the elementary school system as now maintained in Topeka, so far as fixing attendance areas and boundaries for all the elementary school buildings in Topeka; it would require the transfer of many white and negro children from the schools they now attend to other buildings, as well as the transfer and assignment of many teachers to serve the resulting new classes in the various buildings.

Many of the grade schools now used for white children in the city are already full, and some are badly overcrowded. A school building program has been carried on and is being carried on now. The Southwest School was completed and opened in 1952; two other new schools are under construction now, and the Board is deciding on new sites for still two more schools to be constructed as quickly as possible. All five of these new buildings are, or will be, in areas where there have been new housing projects, and where the school population is now and probably will remain predominantly white children. These schools will probably not serve many negro children even when segregation is finally abolished.

The majority of the negro school population resides in a few scattered areas throughout the older parts of the city, and is not evenly distributed throughout the entire city. Many negro children live nearest to white schools which are already overcrowded. To transfer and admit these negro children to the schools nearest their residences will require either that many white children now attending such schools will have to be transferred to other schools, or that annexes will have to be provided. In short we have little doubt that the area boundaries of the existing white and negro schools will have to be redefined. This will necessarily require reassigning students, both white and negro, to schools which they do not now attend, and this in turn will require changing the classes to fit the new children in, and may involve transferring teachers from building to building as well.

It is the plan of the Board of Education of Topeka to make the transition from segregated to integrated elementary schools gradually and in an orderly manner on a school by school basis, but as rapidly as is practically possible. Such changes will be made at convenient times between semesters, and in such a manner that the administrative decisions and changes can be conveniently and efficiently handled without interrupting the continuity of the regular school program. The Board has discussed its policy and plans in open, public meetings attended by members of both white and negro races. It has invited and secured cooperation and suggestions, and the public generally in the community is assisting the Board in achieving its objective of terminating segregation "as rapidly as is practicable."

If this Court should enter an order to abolish segregation in the public schools of Topeka "forthwith," as suggested in Question 4 (a), the Topeka Board would, of course, do its best to comply with the order. We believe, however, that it would probably require that the regular classes be suspended, while the many administrative changes and adjustments are being made, and while the necessary transfers of and reassignment of students and teachers are being made. Important decisions would have to be hurriedly made, without time for careful investigation of the facts nor for careful thought and reflection. Most decisions would have to be made on a temporary or an emergency basis. We believe the attendant confusion and interruption of the regular school program would be against the public interest, and would be damaging to the children, both negro and white alike.

We respectfully urge that in making and issuing its decree this Court has equitable power and discretion to shape the decree and to control its execution in such a manner as to protect the public interest:

United States v. Morgan, 307 U. S. 183, 81 L. Ed. 1211, 59 S. Ct. 795:

> "It is familiar doctrine that the extent to which a court of equity may grant or withhold its aid, and the manner of moulding its remedies, may be affected by the public interest involved." (p. 1219, L. Ed.)

Virginia Ry. Co. v. System Federation No. 40, 300 U. S. 515, 81 L. Ed. 789, 52 S. Ct. 512:

> "6. The extent to which equity will go to give relief where there is no adequate remedy at law is not a matter of fixed rule, but rests rather in the sound discretion of the court.
>
> "7. Courts of equity may, and frequently do, go much further to give and withhold relief in furtherance of the public interest than they are accustomed to go when only private interests are involved." (Syll. 6. and 7.)

Securities Exch. Comm. v. U. S. R. and Imp. Co., 310 U. S. 434, 84 L. Ed. 1293, 60 S. Ct. 1044:

> "7. A court of equity has discretion, in the exercise of jurisdiction committed to it, to grant or deny relief upon performance of conditions which will safeguard the public interest." (Syll. 7.)

Because the Board of Education believes that a "forthwith" order to abolish segregation in the Topeka school system would seriously damage and interrupt the operation and administration of the schools and would be plainly against public interest, and because it believes that an order to abolish segregation, in the public interest, should permit "an effective gradual adjustment"; we respectfully submit that Question 4 (a) propounded by the Court should be answered in the negative, and that Question 4 (b) should be answered in the affirmative.

III.

QUESTIONS 5(a), (b) and (c) SHOULD BE ANSWERED IN THE NEGATIVE

If segregation in the public schools of Topeka is to be abolished by decree of the Court permitting an "effective gradual adjustment" as suggested in Question 4 (b), then the Board of Education should be permitted to manage the readjustment, subject only to the usual and normal jurisdiction always retained by a court of equity for the enforcement of its decree or judgment.

We have heretofore pointed out the many intricate administrative decisions which will be involved in the transition to an integrated system of grade schools in Topeka. These are the problems and decisions which the Board of Education is organized to handle. Clearly there will be considerable administrative expense involved in making the adjustment. In Kansas the Board of Education is required to comply with cash basis and budget laws in connection with such expenditures, and taxes must be levied for such expenses within the levy limitation laws. Thus the necessary adjustments for a transition from segregated to integrated schools will affect nearly all the other administrative actions of the Board of Education. For this Court or a special master to undertake to control the necessary readjustments or to draw detailed orders and decrees will involve them in the control and direction of the administration of the entire school program either directly or indirectly.

BLEED THROUGH

We believe such detailed control by this Court or a special master is unnecessary and undesirable. We therefore submit that Questions 5 (a), (b) and (c) should be answered in the negative.

IV.

QUESTION 5(d) SHOULD ALSO BE ANSWERED IN THE NEGATIVE

If this Court should enter an order or decree as suggested in Question 4 (b), there is no need for a more specific or detailed decree in this case.

The Board of Education of Topeka has already on its own initiative resolved to terminate segregation in the elementary schools "as rapidly as is practicable" and has already taken its first step toward that end by providing for an integrated system in two schools which were formerly used only for white children. Certainly at this time there is no need for a more detailed decree than the decree suggested in Question 4 (b). The District Court will always have jurisdiction to enforce the decree. If the need for a more specific decree should arise in the future, the District Court will have ample power to make such a decree under its general power to enforce the judgment and decree of the court.

We respectfully submit that Question 5 (d) should be answered in the negative.

SUPPLEMENTAL BRIEF FOR THE BOARD OF EDUCATION, TOPEKA, KANSAS, ON QUESTIONS 4 AND 5 PROPOUNDED BY THE COURT

This supplemental brief is filed in response to the order of this Court directing and requesting further briefs and argument on questions 4 and 5 heretofore propounded by the Court.

In its brief, heretofore filed herein in December, 1953, The Board of Education of Topeka urged that in the event segregation in its elementary schools were held to be unconstitutional, this case should simply be remanded to the lower court with instructions to reverse its judgment and to enter a decree requiring that segregation be terminated "as rapidly as is practicable" by the defendant Board of Education. It was suggested that by such a decree the lower court could retain jurisdiction for enforcement of the decree, and that if a need for a more specific decree should arise in the future, the lower court would have power to amplify its decree under the general power of an equity court to enforce its decree.

As was pointed out in its brief filed in December, 1953, The Board of Education of Topeka in September, 1953, adopted a resolution to terminate segregation in its elementary schools "as rapidly as is practicable"; and on September 8, 1953, terminated segregation at two of its elementary schools, to wit: Southwest and Randolph Schools.

Since that time, the Board of Education of Topeka has already taken its second far-reaching step or stride toward termination of segregation by adopting the recommendations of its superintendent of schools as set out in the following report which was made on January 20, 1954, and was approved and adopted by the Board of Education on the same date:

SECOND STEP IN TERMINATION OF SEGREGATION IN TOPEKA ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS

I. In implementation of the Board's policy to terminate segregation in elementary schools as soon as practicable, I propose that the second step be taken at the opening of school in September, 1954. The step should be acted upon by the Board at this time in order to enable everybody concerned to make necessary plans for next year.

II. In the second step, I propose that segregation be terminated in the following school districts and that transportation not be provided for Negro children who are affected, but that such child be given the privilege of attending the nearest Negro School if his parents want him to do so. (All pupil accounting is based on the number belonging on October 16, 1953.)

*The limitation suggested at Grant is that three Negro children isolated in the extreme northern part of Grant School district be permitted to attend Grant, while the remainder of the Negro children continue at McKinley.

The limitation suggested at Polk School is as follows: Several Negro children in this district live very close to Buchanan School. They should continue at this school. There would not be room for them at Polk and there is plenty of room at Buchanan. However, there are three Negro children now attending Monroe School but residing in the Polk district. I suggest that they be allowed to attend Polk School.

III. The effects of taking this step would be as follows:

1. It would reduce the enrollments of Negro Schools as indicated.

	From	To
McKinley	127	89
Buchanan	160	121
Monroe	245	221
Washington	292	280
	824	711

2. It would place 123 Negro children in integrated schools.
3. It would leave, in addition to the four schools for Negro children, 12 schools integrated, 2 schools (Grant and Polk) on a basis of partial integration, and 5 schools continuing on a segregated basis (Lafayette, Lincoln, Lowman Hill, Parkdale and Van Buren.)

Thus, by announcing the changes in the spring of 1954, all parties affected had ample opportunity to adjust themselves to the changes before they became effective the following September.

Segregation has been completely terminated in 12 elementary school districts, and partially terminated in two others; and, as of September, 1954, there will remain only four negro schools and five white schools in which segregation is being continued.

The Board of Education has requested the superintendent, and he plans, to make recommendations for the third step toward termination of segregation early in 1955 to become effective in September, 1955. In the meantime, of course, he will have had an opportunity to observe the results and the operation of the second step which became effective in September, 1954. Thus before taking the third step, the board of education will have the benefit of its experiences with the first and second steps.

BLEED THROUGH

It is gratifying to be able to report to the Court that The Board of Education has been carrying out its policy of termination of segregation "as rapidly as is practicable" with full public cooperation and acceptance by both white and negro pupils, teachers and parents.

The administrative problems, which were discussed in the brief filed in December, 1953, are the chief problems with which The Board of Education is confronted; but with practical experience, they are being satisfactorily solved. Their solution, however, cannot be effected "forthwith," but require time for a gradual adjustment.

It is respectfully submitted that The Board of Education of Topeka is in good faith carrying out its adopted policy to terminate segregation "as rapidly as is practicable," and that there is no need at this time for the appointment of a special master or for the Court to undertake to formulate specific decrees directing the particular steps to be taken to terminate segregation in the schools of Topeka.

Respectfully submitted,

APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
FOR THE DISTRICT OF KANSAS.

SUPPLEMENTAL BRIEF FOR THE STATE OF KANSAS ON QUESTIONS 4 AND 5 PROPOUNDED BY THE COURT.

STATEMENT.

On May 17, 1954, this Court announced its opinion that racial segregation in public education per se is a denial of the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. At the same time the Court sought an expression of the views of the parties relative to the specific decrees to be entered in this case and other cases now pending. More particularly, the Court's request is as follows:

> "In order that we may have the full assistance of the parties in formulating decrees, the cases will be restored to the docket and the parties are requested to present further argument on Questions 4 and 5 previously propounded by the court for reargument this term." (Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, et al., 347 U. S. 483, 495)

The following is respectfully submitted in an effort to comply with that request.

THE QUESTIONS.

Questions 4 and 5 mentioned above, were set forth in the Court's order of June 8, 1953, and are quoted hereafter:

> "4. Assuming it is decided that segregation in public schools violates the Fourteenth Amendment,
>
> "(a) would a decree necessarily follow providing that, within the limits set by normal geographic school districting, Negro children should forthwith be admitted to schools of their choice, or
>
> "(b) may this Court, in the exercise of its equity powers, permit an effective gradual adjustment to be brought about from existing segregation systems to a system not based on color distinctions?
>
> "5. On the assumption on which questions 4(a) and (b) are based, and assuming further that this Court will exercise its equity powers to the end described in question 4(b),

BLEED THROUGH

"(a) should this Court formulate detailed decrees in these cases;

"(b) if so what specific issues should the decrees reach;

"(c) should this Court appoint a special master to hear evidence with a view to recommending specific terms for such decrees;

"(d) should this Court remand to the courts of first instance with directions to frame decrees in these cases, and if so, what general directions should the decrees of this Court include and what procedures should the courts of first instance follow in arriving at the specific terms of more detailed decrees?" (Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, et al., 345 U. S. 972.)

GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS.

We pause at the outset of these comments to emphasize that we do not approach the present questions as an adversary. Heretofore in the arguments of December, 1952, and upon reargument in December, 1953, we presented as fully as we could the arguments in justification of the statute authorizing certain boards of education in Kansas to provide for the education of Negro children in separate schools of equal facility. The arguments then advanced appeared consistent with the reported decisions of this Court, the Supreme Court of Kansas, and Appellate Courts elsewhere. However, the issue in this case has now been determined contra to the position we then urged. We accept without reservation or equivocation the Court's declaration that "in the field of public education, the doctrine of 'separate but equal' has no place." We assure the Court that the resources of state government will be employed to effectuate the decision in the public schools of Kansas. Hence, the sole purpose of this brief is to supply such information as may assist the Court in finally disposing of the Kansas case.

Of the several cases at bar we suspect that the Kansas case may be least complex. Several considerations point to this conclusion. In earlier arguments we have pointed out that the practice of segregation in public education has never been widespread among the communities of the state. Traditionally, Kansans abhor inequality. Except in the case of the elementary schools in cities of the first class, the statutes of Kansas specifically prohibit school authorities from making distinctions based on race, color or previous condition of servitude. (G. S. 1949, 21-2424) Moreover, we think it is significant that quite apart from the Courts decision of May 17, 1954, and through the normal exercise of local autonomy, an accelerated adjustment from existing segregated systems to a system not based on color distinction has been in progress throughout the state. Indeed, it might well be argued that the instant case is moot by reason of the action of the Topeka Board of Education more fully described in its separate brief filed herein.

Segregation has never existed in Kansas as a matter of state policy. Section 72-1724, General Statutes of Kansas of 1949, which has been declared unconstitutional in the present litigation, purported to permit rather than to require segregated elementary schools in the areas to which it applied. Those segregated systems that have been maintained, have existed by virtue of action of local boards of education. Hence we do not contemplate that the termination of segregation in Kansas will be the occasion for any policy adjustment on a state level. No provision of the Constitution of Kansas is affected by the Court's decision of May 17, 1954. There is no occasion for state legislation to provide for or implement the process of de-segregation. The abandonment of segregated school systems will not require the alteration of any policy established by the State Department of Public Instruction or any other state administrative agency. Emphatically, de-segregation will produce no cultural problem nor will it disrupt an established way of life. In fact, there has been no significant amount of protest on the part of any group of Kansas citizens to the elimination of separate schools. Indeed, the prevailing attitude has been one of approval. Presumably, political party platforms reflect attitudes accepted by their members. Note the statement quoted hereafter from the 1954 platform of the Republican Party of Kansas:

BLEED THROUGH

> "We hail the recent historic decision of the Supreme Court of the United States as upholding the traditional position of the Republican Party that there can be no second class citizens under our American form of government." ()

In view of the foregoing, we cannot, in candor, suggest that at state level there are any barriers, legal or otherwise, to the immediate termination of such segregated public school systems as may exist in Kansas. The problems incident to the de-segregation process will be encountered on the local level only, and will be procedural rather than substantial pragmatic rather than essential. At the same time, they are problems that obviously cannot be resolved forthwith by resolutions of boards of education or even by decrees of this Court. Time will be required for deliberation, for decision and for adjustment. How much time? We do not presume to say. We suggest only that in those cases where, as in Kansas, responsible state and local officials are proceeding in diligence and good faith to effect the adjustment required by the Court's opinion herein, such efforts should be recognized by this Court and be permitted to proceed with a minimum of judicial direction.

ARGUMENT ON QUESTIONS PROPOUNDED.

The briefs submitted by the several parties and amici curiae prior to the December 1953 arguments, reveal little significant divergence of view relative to the principles applicable to Questions 4 and 5. Hence, we discuss the questions somewhat summarily.

> "4. Assuming it is decided that segregation in public schools violates the Fourteenth Amendment,
>
> (a) would a decree necessarily follow providing that, within the limits set by normal geopraphic school districting, Negro children should forthwith be admitted to schools of their choice, or
>
> (b) may this Court, in the exercise of its equity powers, permit an effective gradual adjustment to be brought about from existing segregated systems to a system not based on color distinctions?"

BLEED THROUGH

The assumption stated has now become the established principle of law. The questions go to the power of a court of equity.

We think that a decree providing that, within the limits set by normal geographic school districting, Negro children should forthwith be admitted to schools of their choice, does not necessarily follow the opinion of May 17. On the other hand, we believe that this Court, in the exercise of its equity powers, may permit an effective gradual adjudgment from existing segregated systems to a system not based on color distinctions. The very fact that these questions are now being argued, some seven months after the decision that segregation violates constitutional rights, suggests that the power to postpone compliance does exist.

The decree must seek to reconcile the personal and present interest of the Negro citizen, whose constitutional rights have been violated, with the public interest in safeguarding the integrity of the school system. To illustrate, we call attention specifically to a statement contained in the separate brief of the Board of Education of Topeka submitted prior to the December, 1953, arguments:

> "If this Court should enter an order to abolish segregation in the public schools of Topeka 'forthwith', as suggested in Question 4(a), the Topeka Board would, of course, do its best to comply with the order. We believe, however, that it would probably require that the regular classes be suspended, while the many administrative changes and adjustments are being made, and while the necessary transfers of and reassignment of students and teachers are being made. Important decisions would have to be hurriedly made, without time for careful investigation of the facts nor for careful thought and reflection. Most decisions would have to be made on a temporary or an emergency basis. We believe the attendant confusion and interruption of the regular school program would be against the public interest, and would be damaging to the children, both negro and white alike." (pp. 4-5) (Italics supplied)

We think it cannot be disputed that a court of equity has power to avoid such a consequence.

The reports abound with authority for the proposition that it is the duty of a court of equity "to strike a proper balance between the needs of the plaintiff and the consequences of giving the desired relief." (Eccles v. Peoples Bank, 333 U. S. 426, 431.)

" . . . equity will administer such relief as the exigencies of the case demand at the close of the trial." (Chapman v. Sheridan-Wyoming Coal Co., Inc., 338 U. S. 621, 630.)

"The essence of equity jurisdiction has been the power of the Chancellor to do equity and to mould each decree to the necessities of the particular case. Flexibility rather than rigidity has distinguished it. The qualities of mercy and practicality have made equity the instrument for nice adjustment and reconciliation between the public interest and private needs as well as between competing private claims." (Hecht Co. v. Bowles, 321 U. S. 321, 329-330.)

"It is familiar doctrine that the extent to which a court of equity may grant or withhold its aid, and the manner of moulding its remedies, may be affected by the public interest involved." (U. S. v. Morgan, 307 U. S. 183.)

"A court of equity has discretion, in the exercise of jurisdiction committed to it, to grant or deny relief upon performance of conditions which will safeguard the public interest." (Securities Exch. Comm. v. U S R & Imp. Co., 310 U. S. 434, Syl. 7.)

"In short, the judicial process is not without the resources of flexibility in shaping its remedies . . . " (Addison v. Holly Hill Co., 322 U. S. 607, 622.)

We presume that no principle of equity jurisprudence is more familiar than that illustrated by the foregoing statements. It would seem that the authorities cited would preclude further argument on Question 4. However, this proposition has been discussed at some length in the supplemental brief for the United States on reargument filed herein prior to the arguments in December, 1953. We call the Court's attention specifically to the discussion and authorities contained in that brief on pages 152 to 167, inclusive, and suggest that we are in substantial agreement with the views expressed therein.

Question 5 assumes that 4(b) has been answered in the affirmative. The Court then inquires:

"(a) should this Court formulate detailed decrees in these cases;

"(b) if so what specific issues should the decrees reach;

"(c) should this Court appoint a special master to hear evidence with a view to recommending specific terms for such decrees;

> "(d) should this Court remand to the courts of first instance with directions to frame decrees in these cases, and if so, what general directions should the decrees of this Court include and what procedures should the courts of first instance follow in arriving at the specific terms of more detailed decrees?"

This question compels our attention to the inherent limitations on the judicial power. We doubt that the Court contemplates the judicial development of a plan for the de-segregation of the schools of Kansas or any other state. If such action is contemplated, we doubt that it is legally or practically feasible. The Court may determine, as it has determined, that the segregated school system heretofore maintained in Topeka, Kansas, violates the Constitution of the United States. It may determine whether a gradual adjustment to a system not based on color distinctions is authorized. However, it cannot tell the Topeka Board of Education what non-segregated school system will be substituted for the one heretofore maintained, nor can it prescribe the course to be followed in effecting the substitution. These are determinations that must necessarily be made with reference to local conditions—conditions that were not germane to the question of whether segregation per se is unconstitutional and hence are not reflected by the record now before the Court. They are determinations that must be made by local officials who are familiar with local conditions and who are responsible for local educational policy and for the general administration of the school system. We urge that those officials be given the maximum latitude consistent with the rights of appellants.

We emphasize that in the exercise of appellate jurisdiction, the Court's considerations are limited by the record forwarded from the court of original jurisdiction. The present questions have appeared in the case since the trial in the court below. Hence, before any detailed decree could be framed, additional evidence would probably be required. We suggest that the District Court is the proper forum to hear evidence and determine facts.

> "The framing of decrees should take place in the district courts rather than in the appellate courts." (International Salt Co. v. United States, 332 U. S. 392.)

A review of the precedents would indicate that this Court, as a matter of policy, has heretofore refused to frame detailed decrees in cases involving segregation in education. In those cases where school facilities have been held unequal and where administrative action has been required to secure equality, the Court has not attempted to determine precise standards to be observed by the parties in order to finally dispose of the case. Rather, the Court has been content to remand the case to the lower court for further proceedings consistent with and in conformity with its opinion. (Sipuel v. Board of Regents, 332 U. S. 631; Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, Registrar, 305 U. S. 337, and Henderson v. United States, 339 U. S. 816.)

Thus, we answer part (a) of Question 5 in the negative. This answer obviously precludes comment on part (b). Similarly, we answer part (c) in the negative. We believe that the only order necessary in the present case, indeed, the only one justified by the circumstances, is one reversing the judgment of District Court, and remanding the cause to said court with directions to enter an appropriate decree. We suggest further that the District Court be directed to retain jurisdiction of the cause until such time as the maintenance of segregated schools by Appellee Board of Education is finally terminated. Implicit in such an order would be the power of the District Court upon appropriate motion by any of the parties to deal with special problems arising during the transition period.

Finally, we suggest that the decrees of both this Court and the District Court should provide for a minimum of judicial control.

> "It is in the public interest that federal courts of equity should exercise their discretionary power to grant or withhold relief so as to avoid needless obstruction of the domestic policy of the states . . . " (Alabama Pub. Serv. Comm. v. Southern Ry. Co., 341 U. S. 341, 351.)

Wherever responsible state and local officials are proceeding in good faith to make the adjustments required by the Court's opinion of May 17, 1954, we suggest that their efforts be recognized and that they not be hedged by detailed judicial orders.

BLEED THROUGH

CURRENT DE-SEGREGATION TRENDS.

In its separate brief, the Topeka Board of Education has advised the Court of its action to terminate its segregated schools. Hence, we comment on that situation only briefly. Since September, 1953, Topeka has moved from universal segregation in its elementary schools, to a system consisting of 12 integrated schools, two partially integrated, five schools maintained exclusively for white students and four attended only by Negroes. One hundred and twenty-three Negro students now attend mixed elementary schools. We deem this significant progress.

In other communities of Kansas, boards of education not parties to this suit are initiating similar policies. Since these arguments have apparently come to transcend the original parties and issues, we trust it is not improper to comment on the experience of Kansas in areas other than Topeka.

Section 72-1724, General Statutes of Kansas, 1949, authorizing segregated elementary schools, applied to twelve cities of the state. One city, Hutchinson, never exercised the power the statute purported to confer. Two cities, Wichita and Pittsburg, maintained separate elementary schools for many years, but for reasons of local policy, terminated the practice in 1952. The recent action of Topeka is mentioned above and is detailed in the separate brief of its Board of Education. Six other cities of the state have, during the past year, commenced or completed the process of de-segregating their public schools.

Atchison. Atchison, a city of 13,000 persons, is located on the boundary between Kansas and Missouri. Its population is about 10% Negro. Segregation has been maintained in the public elementary schools of Atchison since the establishment of the system. It may be significant that the city was founded in 1854 by persons of pro-slavery sympathies and for years the southern tradition was manifest in the community. Prior to the present school year four elementary schools, each serving a fixed geographical area, have been maintained exclusively for white students and one elementary school has been maintained for Negroes. On September 12, 1953, the Board of Education adopted the following resolution:

> "That the plan of abolition of segregation in the public schools of Atchison heretofore established by the Board of Education and which has been effected in grades seven through twelve be intensified so as to complete the plan throughout grades one through six as soon as practicable."

Subsequent thereto, on June 9, 1954, the policy was implemented by the adoption of a further resolution, the text of which is set forth hereafter:

> "Motion was made by Mr. Thorning that segregation of negro pupils be discontinued as of this date in all Atchison city school districts with the exception of the Martin-Lincoln district; thereby eliminating the necessity for operation of the school bus transporting pupils to Lincoln school; also, that beginning with the school term of September 1955, all segregation be ended in the Martin-Lincoln district under such a plan as will promote the best interests of the students in our school system."

BLEED THROUGH

At the present time in excess of 25% of the Negro students of the city are attending mixed schools. The Board of Education anticipates that the process of desegregation will be completed by September 1, 1955. In addition to the integration of students as above set forth, a Negro has been employed as an elementary class-room teacher, teaching predominately white 6th grade classes. School administrators anticipate that all Negro teachers presently employed, will be assimilated into the integrated system.

Lawrence. Seat of the State University, Lawrence is a city of 24,000 population. About 7% of the people are Negro. Segregated schools had been maintained since prior to 1869. The process of assimilating the Negroes into white schools was apparently begun about 1916, with the result that during the past few years only one school had been maintained exclusively for Negroes. Subsequent to the decision of the Supreme Court of May 17, 1954, the Lawrence Board of Education ordered the immediate termination of segregation in all its public schools. In addition a Negro teacher was employed in the school system to teach special classes in junior high school and to teach physical education in the elementary schools, all of which classes are attended by predominately white students. The seriousness with which this community approaches the problem is indicated by the following comment of a school official in a communication addressed to the Attorney General of Kansas:

> "We recognize that some Kansas communities have problems more grave than ours—and we have some hurdles certainly.

"Does integration mean the mixing of white and colored pupils only? What is the status of the colored teacher? This year we employed one colored teacher on the basis of qualification for the job—but we recognize the possibility of unfavorable reaction when a colored person is employed as a teacher of a self contained room. Such adaptations must come slowly but must be achieved if integration is to be more than a term referring to mixing of colored and white pupils."

Leavenworth. Leavenworth, a city in excess of 20,000 inhabitants, has a Negro population of about 10%. The segregated system of elementary schools was established in 1858 and has been maintained consistently since that time. At present two elementary schools are maintained exclusively for Negro students, whereas nine are attended only by white. The policy announced by the Leavenworth Board of Education of August 2, 1954, indicates the reaction of the people of this community to the decision of May 17. The statement of policy is set forth hereafter:

"Pupils who enter the kindergarten or the first grade in the fall of 1954 will be permitted to enroll in the school of the district in which they reside regardless of race. Such negro pupils regardless of residence may continue to attend Lincoln and Sumner schools which will be adequately staffed with capable Negro teachers. It will be necessary for a time to establish attendance districts for the Lincoln and Sumner schools in order to carry out this policy. It is the belief of the Board of Education that the negro people in the Leavenworth community may desire to continue their schools as presently operated for a term of years during the transition period.

BLEED THROUGH

"The Board of Education in this statement of policy believes it to be consistent with the Supreme Court decision in that it is starting in an orderly way to move away from compulsory segregation.

"It is believed that integration, when desired by the parents, can best be initiated at the lower grade levels. Those colored pupils who enroll in non-negro-staffed schools at the kindergarten or first grade level may continue in the school through subsequent grades.

"It is believed that it will be best for the individual if integration begins at the primary level. Also, the existing school system has been established in a certain pattern, and because of limited facilities, the pattern of enrollment cannot be suddenly changed. The Board of Education is required to provide school facilities and to frame policies for the welfare of all pupils.

"The Board will continue to study the problem and restate its policies consistent with the expressed desires of the people within the framework of the Supreme Court decision.

"The Board solicits the cooperation of all citizens in making an orderly transition from a segregated to a non-segregated school system. It looks to the State Legislature, the State Department of Public Instruction and the Attorney General for counsel in the continuous reframing of its policies consistent with the Supreme Court's interpretation regarding the constitutionality of the Kansas statute under which Leavenworth schools have operated since 1879.

"The Board will make an effort to follow the suggestions and recommendations of the Supreme Court as promised to be made by that body subsequent to October, 1954."

The first positive step taken by the Leavenworth school system consistent with its declared policy has been the admission during the 1954-55 school year of kindergarten and first-grade pupils to the school nearest their residence regardless of race. Presumably next year the Board intends to extend this policy to the second or higher grades, although a positive statement to this effect has not been announced. The following comment of a public school official of Leavenworth suggests one of the problems incident to de-segregation, and the community's approach thereto:

> "It is the intention of the Leavenworth Board of Education to be completely fair in the treatment of its faithful and competent negro teachers. It has been in the cities maintaining segregated schools where the opportunity for employment has existed for negro teachers. There will be questions raised as to why we cannot suddenly integrate our teachers in these cities, and there will be a few sporadic cases for publicity purposes to illustrate that negro teachers can be used indiscriminately. There are frequent cleavages between teachers and pupils at best. Some pupils resist authority and for various reasons have to be disciplined, restrained, or corrected. This often puts parents on the defensive and causes them to question or resist the teacher's authority. Now, if that teacher of a white child should be a negro, the cleavage would be magnified fifty to a hundredfold. I am sure you are well aware of this.
>
> "The Leavenworth Board believes that for a considerable length of time, negro teachers will be used in schools attended almost entirely by negro pupils. It is perfectly logical to ask, why cannot we integrate them in one magnanimous action? What about communities like Hutchinson who has never had segregation? Have they ever employed a negro teacher or are they likely to start employing them now? In my judgment, the solution will have to be carefully and slowly introduced. You and I and most board members will readily agree to the righteousness of complete integration from the standpoint of our established principles of decency, christianity and democracy. However, there is a sufficient number of biased and prejudiced persons who will make life miserable for those in authority who attempt to move in that direction too rapidly. As a consequence, many of us will be accused of 'dragging our feet' in the matter, not because of our personal feelings or inclinations, but because in dealing with the public, its general approval and acceptance is indispensable. One cannot force it, he can only coax and nurture it along."

BLEED THROUGH

Kansas City. Kansas City has a total population of about 130,000, 20.5 percent of which belong to the Negro race. It is adjacent to Kansas City, Missouri. It is perhaps significant that the proportion of Negroes in Kansas City, Kansas, is greater than in such southern cities as Dallas, Louisville, Saint Louis, Tulsa, Miami and Oklahoma City, and only slightly less than that of Baltimore. Kansas City is the only community in Kansas where by virtue of law segregated high schools have been maintained. Prior to the present school year the City of Kansas City has maintained seven elementary schools, one junior high-school and one high school exclusively for its 6000 Negro students, while twenty-two schools were attended by more than 23,000 white students. On August 2, 1954, the following statement of policy was adopted by the Board of Education of Kansas City:

> "The members of the Board of Education, meeting as a committee of the whole, propose the adoption of the following statement of policy with reference to the Supreme Court decision on segregation:
>
> "The Board of Education of the City of Kansas City of the State of Kansas hereby declares its intent to abide by the spirit as well as the letter of the Supreme Court's decision on segregation. Specifically, the Board of Education proposes:
>
> "1. To begin integration in all the public schools at the opening of school on September 13, 1954.
>
> "2. To complete the integration as rapidly as class room space can be provided.
>
> "3. To accomplish the transition from segregation to integration in a natural and orderly manner designed to protect the interests of all the pupils and to insure the support of the whole community.
>
> "4. To avoid any disruption of the professional life of career teachers.
>
> "With these objectives in mind, the Board of Education directs the Superintendent of Schools within the framework of this policy declaration to be responsible for developing and applying the plan of integration."

The plan subsequently adopted permitted Negro students in kindergarten and grades 1, 6, 7, 10, 11 and 12 to enter the school of their choice within normal geographic limitations. Because the bulk of the Negro population is concentrated in one area of the city, the termination of compulsory segregation will not eliminate schools attended exclusively by Negroes. However, a total of 233 Negro students are now attending mixed schools, and approximately 1000 more live in areas where the process of amalgamation is now in progress. A report to the Attorney General's Office, dated October 12, 1954, from a school administrator indicates:

BLEED THROUGH

> "The announced program by the Board of Education was well received by whites and negroes alike and it is felt that integration in our schools is accepted and will be completed when classroom space permits. We are now engaged in the completion of a 6½ million dollar building program which includes the immediate problem before us."

School officials anticipate that subsequent to the completion of the amalgamation program all Negro teachers presently employed in the system will be retained.

Parsons. Parsons is located in southeastern Kansas some twenty miles from the Oklahoma border. It is a city of about 15,000 population, less than 10% of whom are Negroes. Prior to the current school year four elementary schools were maintained for white students and one for Negroes. Commencing with the current year, the Board of Education announced a policy to the effect that whenever possible and practical, restrictions on school attendance are to be immediately removed and segregation eliminated. In line with this policy, segregation was eliminated in three of four ward elementary school areas at the beginning of the 1954-55 school year. The remaining school area is being operated on a segregated basis because of crowded conditions. The separate Negro school is located in this ward. Consequently every child may attend an elementary school in the ward in which he resides.

It is the present policy of the Board to delay integration of the schools of the fourth ward until additional school facilities will be completed. At the present time twenty-six Negro students in Parsons are attending mixed elementary schools, while one hundred and forty-three are required to attend the school maintained exclusively for Negroes.

Salina. Segregation was terminated in the City of Salina prior to the opening of the current school term. In view of the fact that less than 3% of the city's 27,000 people are Negroes, the problems incident to assimilation were slight. Prior to the present school term, one school was attended by all Negroes of the city. The present policy of the Board of Education permits all students to attend the school located nearest their homes.

Cities Reporting no Action. Only two cities, Coffeyville and Fort Scott, report that action by their Boards of Education has been delayed, pending final determination of this case. In these cities an aggregate of about 400 Negro students attend three segregated schools. Both cities are located in Southern Kansas, and school officials indicate that there has been no local sentiment in favor of the termination of the policy of segregation. In one city, it is reported that the only protest against the prospect of de-segregation has come from the Negro citizens. However, in each of these communities local school officials stand ready to take such action as may be consistent with the policies to be announced by this Court and the best interests of their people.

CONCLUSION.

We respectfully submit that all considerations germane to the present issues require that the decree of this Court do no more than reverse the judgment of the District Court and remand the cause to said court with directions to enter judgment consistent with the opinion herein and to retain jurisdiction thereof until said judgment be complied with.

No. 8

OLIVER BROWN, et al., Appellants,

vs.

BOARD OF EDUCATION OF TOPEKA, SHAWNEE COUNTY, KANSAS, et al., Appellees.

BRIEF OF
AMERICAN VETERANS COMMITTEE, INC. (AVC)
Amicus Curiae

The issue in this case. This case raises the issue whether a State may require the separation, by race or color, of pupils in the public elementary schools, where such separation retards the educational and mental development of the Negro pupils and admittedly deprives them of educational benefits available to the white pupils, even though the physical facilities provided "are comparable."

The Interest of the American Veterans Committee.

The American Veterans Committee (AVC) is a nationwide organization of veterans who served honorably in the Armed Forces of the United States during World Wars I and II, and the Korean conflict. We are associated to promote the democratic principles for which we fought, including the elimination of racial discrimination. Most of us served overseas. There was no "community pattern" of racial discrimination and segregation when the chips were down and there was only the mud, the foxholes, and the dangers of the ocean and of mortal battle in the fight to preserve our Nation's democratic ideals. We believe that the segregation here involved is of the same cloth as the racism against which we fought in World War II, and that its continuance is detrimental to our national welfare, both at home and abroad.

The Facts in This Case.

Chapter 72-1724, General Statutes of Kansas, Ann. (1949), authorizes the maintenance of "separate schools for the education of white and colored children, including the high schools in Kansas City, Kan.; no discrimination on account of color shall be made in high schools, except as provided herein..." Pursuant to this statute, the City of Topeka, Kansas, provides public elementary education through the sixth grade in 18 schools for white children and 4 schools for colored children. The City does not segregate white and colored children in the junior high schools (beginning with the 7th grade) or in the high schools (R. 12). The appellants, Negro parents and pupils, seek to enjoin the appellees from denying to Negro pupils the privilege of attending public schools within the school territory where they live, without racial segregation (R. 7, 11).

The court below "found as a fact" that the white and colored elementary schools "are comparable" insofar as concerns "the physical facilities, the curricula, courses of study, qualification of and quality of teachers, as well as other educational facilities in the two sets of schools" and that "in the maintenance and operation of the schools there is no willful, intentional or substantial discrimination in the matters referred to above between the colored and white schools" (R. 239, 240). But the court further found (Finding VII; R. 245-246) that:

BLEED THROUGH

> "Segregation of white and colored children in public schools has a detrimental effect upon the colored children. The impact is greater when it has the sanction of the law; for the policy of separating the races is usually interpreted as denoting the inferiority of the negro group. A sense of inferiority affects the motivation of a child to learn. Segregation with the sanction of law, therefore, has a tendency to retain [retard] the educational and mental development of negro children and to deprive them of some of the benefits they would receive in a racial integrated school system."

Notwithstanding the latter finding, however, the court below refused to enjoin the segregation of white and colored children in the public elementary schools, solely because the court felt that the decisions of this Court in Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537 (1896) and in Gong Lum v. Rice, 275 U. S. 78 (1927) support the constitutionality of a segregated school system in the lower grades, and that this Court's decisions in Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629 (1950) and McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U. S. 637 (1950), which dealt with racial distinctions in professional and graduate education, have not affected the authority of Plessy and Gong Lum insofar as elementary school education is concerned. Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, 98 F. Supp. 797 (D. C., D. Kans. 1951).

ARGUMENT

I. Psychological Discrimination Imposed By Government On Account of Race Violates the Constitutional Guarantee of Equal Protection of the Laws.

Although the court below recognized that compulsory racial segregation in public elementary schools is unconstitutional where the physical facilities (such as school buildings, teachers, books, courses of study, etc.) are provided unequally for white and colored pupils, it held, in effect, that the government may constitutionally retard

"the educational and mental development of Negro children and . . . deprive them of educational benefits available to white children" by imposing psychological feelings of inferiority. The finding by the court below that compulsory separation by race denotes the colored child as of an inferior group and that a "sense of inferiority affects the motivation of a child to learn" is supported by the uncontradicted evidence in this case (R. 118, 155-156, 165, 169-172, 176-177), and is in accord with the scientific findings of many eminent psychologists and sociologists. Deutcher and Chein, The Psychological Effect of Enforced Segregation: A Survey of Social Science Opinion, 26 Journ. of Psych. 259 (1948); Cooper, The Frustrations of Being a Member of a Minority Group: What Does It Do to the Individual and to His Relationships With Other People?, 29 Mental Hygiene 189 (1945); McLean, Psychodynamic Factors in Racial Relations, 244 Annals of the Amer. Acad. of Pol. and Soc. Sci 159, 161 (Mar. 1946); Goff, Problems and Emotional Difficulties of Negro Children Due to Race, 19 Journ. of Negro Ed. 152 (1950); see also authorities cited in Appendix to Appellants' Brief in this case. A person, whether adult or child, who is beset by such psychological tension "simply cannot function efficiently" (Deutcher and Chein, supra, 272), and where it is imposed simply because of his race he is not being treated equally, no matter how "equal" may be the physical facilities afforded to him. Even such experts in physical discrimination as Hitler's Nazis did not disdain ostentatious ostracism as a device to impose psychological discrimination.

Under our Constitution and the decisions of this Court, racism is no justification for any governmentally imposed discrimination. This Court has consistently held that "Distinctions between citizens solely because of their ancestry are by their very nature odious to a free people whose institutions are founded upon the doctrine of equality" [Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U. S. 81, 100 (1943)]; that "discriminations based on race alone are obviously irrelevant and invidious" [Steele v. Louisville & Nashville R. Co., 323 U. S. 192, 203 (1944)]; and that "racial discrimination .... is at war with our basic concepts of a democratic society" [Smith v. Texas, 311 U. S. 128, 130 (1940)].

The fact that the discrimination here imposed on colored elementary school children of Topeka, Kansas, is partially psychological and relates to community attitudes and individual feelings does not make it any less cognizable in law. Anglo-American law has long granted judicial protection against defamations which tend to "disgrace" a person or "lower him in or exclude him from society or bring him into contempt or ridicule."[1] The essence of the injury is psychological—the imposition of public obloquy and odium, whether done with or without writing or words, e.g., "riding skimmington" to ridicule a henpecked husband publicly;[2] portraying a person as the Beast in a painting of Beauty and the Beast;[3] painting a man "playing at cudgels with his wife";[4] making a drawing of a person in a pillory;[5] or setting a lamp in front of a person's dwelling where the popular significance, in the social setting and circumstances of the place and time, was to impute reproach, odium and ignominy.[6]

Moreover, the numerous decisions of Southern courts awarding damages for "humiliation" to a white person who has been compelled to ride in the Negro section of a train,[7] or who is excluded from an office-building elevator set apart for whites and is compelled to ride in an elevator set apart for Negroes,[8] or who has been called "colored" or "mulatto",[9] are all based on the proposition that strong feelings of contempt and scorn are directly associated with the view that Negroes have an inferior caste status and that the compulsory segregation of Negroes is intended to reflect such inferior caste status.

The Fourteenth Amendment was adopted precisely to abrogate the disadvantages resulting from an inferior caste status imposed by law. Chief Justice Taney, in the historic decision in Dred Scott v. Sandford, 60 U. S. (19 How.) 393, 407 (1857), had described Negroes as having "for more than a century before been regarded as beings of an inferior order, and altogether unfit to associate with the white race, either in social or political relations; and so far inferior that they had no rights which the white man was bound to respect." The Fourteenth Amendment was particularly intended to repudiate that view, and therefore reached beyond the Thirteenth Amendment (which abolished slavery and involuntary servitude) to elevate the Negro to full citizenship and complete equality before the law. It did not provide for "second-class citizenship" or prescribe "separate but equal" treatment; instead, it "made the rights and responsibilities, civil and criminal, of the two races exactly the same." Virginia v. Rives, 100 U. S. 313, 318 (1880) (emphasis supplied).

The contemporaneous decisions of this Court fully reflected this understanding. In Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U. S. 303 (1880), this Court pointed out that the Fourteenth Amendment was framed and adopted to protect the colored people, who "had long been regarded as an inferior and subject race", against State action designed "to perpetuate the distinctions that had before existed" (at p. 306). The Fourteenth Amendment granted "a positive immunity, or right, most valuable to the colored race,—the right to exemption from unfriendly legislation against them distinctively as colored,—exemption from legal discriminations, implying inferiority in civil society, lessening the security of their enjoyment of the rights which others enjoy, and discriminations which are steps toward reducing them to the condition of a subject race.... The very fact that colored people are singled out ... is practically a brand upon them, affixed by the law, an assertion of their inferiority, and a stimulant to that race prejudice which is an impediment to securing to individuals of the race that equal justice which the law aims to secure to all others." (pp. 307-308) (emphasis supplied).

In Ex Parte Virginia, 100 U. S. 339, 344-345 (1880), this Court said: "One great purpose of these amendments was to raise the colored race from that condition of inferiority and servitude in which most of them had previously stood, into perfect equality of civil rights with all other persons within the jurisdiction of the States. They were intended to take away all possibility of oppression by law because of race or color." (Emphasis supplied).

Equally perceptive of the true meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment was the contemporaneous decision by this Court in Railroad Company v. Brown, 84 U. S. (17 Wall.) 445 (1873). There, a railroad company which furnished a car for colored people "equal in comfort to the cars reserved for white people" contended that it was not discriminating against colored people by refusing them admittance to the cars reserved for white people. This Court unanimously rejected that early manifestation of the "separate but equal" theory as "an ingenious attempt to evade a compliance with the obvious meaning of the requirement

... this discrimination must cease, and the colored and white race, in the use of the cars, be placed on an equality." (at pp. 452-453).

Even Plessy v. Ferguson, supra, relied on by the court below, recognized the impact of the Constitution against a State-imposed inferior caste status. By asserting, as an assumed fact, that segregation laws "do not necessarily imply the inferiority of either race to the other" (163 U. S. 537, 544, 551), Plessy indicated that segregation laws would be unconstitutional where they in fact implied that one race is inferior to another race. And in this case, on the basis of full and uncontradicted evidence, the court below expressly found that segregation in the Topeka elementary schools denotes the inferiority of the Negro pupils and thereby tends to retard their educational and mental development.

Mr. Justice Harlan's prophetic dissent in Plessy against "state enactments, which, in fact, proceed on the ground that colored citizens are so inferior and degraded that they cannot be allowed to sit" with white people (at p. 560), has been underscored by more than 56 years of experience. Every survey of racial segregation and every scientific study of its effects have confirmed "this basic fact: a law which forbids a group of American citizens to associate with other citizens in the ordinary course of daily living creates inequality by imposing a caste status on the minority group." To Secure These Rights, Report of the President's Committee on Civil Rights, p. 82 (Oct. 29, 1947). See also Gunnar Myrdal, An American Dilemma, The Negro Problem and Modern Democracy, p. 581 (1944); Higher Education for American Democracy, Report of the President's Commission on Higher Education, Vol. II, p. 31 (Dec. 11, 1947); Segregation in Washington, Report of the National Committee on Segregation in the Nation's Capital (Dec. 10, 1948).

By segregating colored children from other children in its elementary public schools, the City of Topeka, Kansas, is using governmental power to impose an inferior caste status on the colored children. The Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution "nullifies sophisticated as well as simple-minded modes of discrimination." Lane v. Wilson, 307 U. S. 268, 275 (1939); Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356 (1886); Yu Cong Eng v. Trinidad, 271 U. S. 500, 525-527 (1926); Takahashi v. Fish & Game Commission, 334 U. S. 410, 420 (1948); Henderson v. United States, 339 U. S. 816, 825 (1950).

II. This Case is Governed by This Court's Decisions in the SWEATT and McLAURIN Cases, Not the PLESSY and GONG LUM Cases.

In Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629 (1950), this Court ruled that the refusal to admit a qualified Negro to the University of Texas Law School was unconstitutional even though the State provided law school education for him at a separate school for Negroes. This Court did not simply compare the physical facilities of the two schools. "What is more important," said this Court, are "qualities which are incapable of objective measurement," including, among others, "standing in the community, traditions and prestige," and factors of "isolation" from, and "academic vacuum, removed from the interplay of ideas and the exchange of views" with, the dominant majority (p. 634).

In McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U. S. 637 (1950) there was no question as to the equality of the physical facilities provided for white and colored students. McLaurin used "the same classroom, library and cafeteria as students of other races," but was assigned to a seat or table designated for colored students (p. 640). This Court ruled that restrictions setting the colored student "apart from the other students .... impair and inhibit his ability to study, to engage in discussions and exchange views with other students, and" (p. 641) ".... under these circumstances the Fourteenth Amendment precludes differences in treatment by the state based upon race" (p. 642).

The logic and thrust of the Sweatt and McLaurin decisions cannot justifiably be restricted to professional and graduate schools or to any other level of public education. Any restriction in public institutions of learning, based on race, which retards educational and mental development of a student is as unconstitutional in an elementary school as at any other level of public education. Indeed, the constitutional right to freedom from such restrictions is even more important at the elementary level where the growing twig is being shaped. If racial restrictions are permitted to deform the student's mind and personality in his early stages of education, he cannot in later life hope to compete on an equal basis, either at the unrestricted graduate level or elsewhere, with those not so retarded. (Cf. R. 172). The Sweatt and McLaurin decisions therefore require the elimination in this case of that factor—racial segregation—which produces educational handicaps for the colored pupil vis-a-vis the white pupil.

This case is not governed by Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537 (1896) or Gong Lum v. Rice, 275 U. S. 78 (1927). If, as held by the court below, the decisions in Sweatt and McLaurin are not applicable to racial segregation at the elementary school level (as here), simply because the racial segregation in those cases was in professional and graduate education, then Plessy is wholly irrelevant to this case. First, the "only issue made" in that case was as to segregation in transportation, not in schools (p. 549). Second, Plessy did not sanction a general standard of racial segregation as such. The Plessy standard was that only reasonable distinctions based on race are constitutional. It regarded as unreasonable, and therefore unconstitutional, any law "requiring colored people to walk upon one side of the street, and white people upon the other, or requiring white men's houses to be painted white, and colored men's black, or their vehicles or business signs to be of different colors, upon the theory that one side of the street is as good as the other, or that a house or vehicle of one color is as good as one of another color" (pp. 549-550). Third, the dicta as to schools were intended only to show that segregation in transportation was less "obnoxious" than segregated schools "the constitutionality of which does not seem to have been questioned" (p. 551) and that segregated schools had not then been outlawed by State court action (pp. 544, 545). The insubstantiality of that dicta is emphasized by the absence of any evidence in that case as to either (a) the reasonableness of the distinction or (b) the inequalities resulting therefrom. In this case, however, the evidence shows both the unreasonableness of the distinction and the resultant inequalities.

Gong Lum involved only the question whether the word "colored" in the Mississippi constitution requiring separate schools for "white and colored" children applied to children of Chinese ancestry as well as to Negro children. The plaintiff there expressly agreed with the desirability and legality of segregating Negro and white children, and claimed only that a Chinese child should be classified as "white" in order to protect the Chinese child from the "risks and dangers" of association with Negro children (pp. 10, 14, 16, Brief of Plaintiff in Error, No. 29, Oct. Term, 1927; 275 U.S. 78-79). The Court assumed that the schools for Negro children were equal to those for white children and ruled only that the question of classification of a person was not one meriting "full argument and consideration" (pp. 85-86). Gong Lum did not involve the constitutionality of separating children by race in the public schools where such separation is shown, as here, to retard the educational and mental development of children of the minority group.

III. The Segregation in This Case Cannot Be Supported Under Any Proper Test. And Even if the PLESSY Rule of "Reasonable" Segregation Has Any Vitality, the Segregation Here is Unreasonable and Should Be Enjoined.

This Court has consistently ruled that the "ultimate test of validity" of most statutes is whether they are pertinent and have a rational relationship to a legitimate legislative objective. Asbury Hospital v. Cass County, 326 U. S. 207, 214 (1945); Sage Stores Co. v. Kansas ex rel. Mitchell, 323 U. S. 32 (1944); Metropolitan Casualty Ins. Co. v. Brownell, 294 U. S. 580, 583 (1935). Where the statute restricts personal rights and liberties, more is required—this Court will "weigh the circumstances and . . . appraise the substantiality of the reasons advanced in support of the" restriction. Schneider v. State, 308 U. S. 147, 161 (1939); Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U. S. 88, 96 (1940); cf. Minnesota v. Barber, 136 U. S. 313, 320 (1890); Nectow v. Cambridge, 277 U. S. 183, 188 (1928). The requirements become even greater with respect to "legal restrictions which curtail the civil rights of a single racial group;" such restrictions "are immediately suspect" and are subjected to "the most rigid scrutiny." Korematsu v. United States, 323 U. S. 214, 216 (1944); Takahashi v. Fish & Game Comm., 334 U. S. 410, 420 (1948). Indeed, this Court has said: "States may do a good deal of classifying that it is difficult to believe rational, but there are limits, and it is too clear for extended argument that color cannot be made the basis for a statutory classification affecting the right set up in this case." Nixon v. Herndon, 273 U. S. 536, 541 (1927). And at the last Term, this Court emphasized that "a requirement of color, as we have pointed out before, is not reasonably related to any legitimate legislative objective." Ray v. Blair, 343 U. S. 214, 226, ftnt. 14 (1952).

Under none of these tests can the racial restriction in this case be sustained. There is no evidence that segregation in the first six grades is pertinent to or has a rational relationship to any legitimate legislative objective. Nor are there substantial reasons shown to support this segregation as a necessary measure to prevent any important and substantial harm, either to the community, to efficient public education, to the white children, or to anyone else.

Prejudice and private social views are obviously insufficient legal justification for the racial restriction. No one has the right to demand that the government discriminate, by exclusion or segregation or otherwise, against other citizens in the use of a public facility, simply on account of their race or color, merely because he does not wish to associate with them. McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U. S. 637, 641 (1950); Ferguson v. Gies, 82 Mich. 358, 367-368, 46 N. W. 718, 721 (1890); Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U. S. 1, 19 (1948).

There is not even a serious assertion of possible race conflict if integration occurs, an assertion which usually accompanies the "convenient apologetics of the police power" evoked in race litigation. Morgan v. Virginia, 328 U. S. 373, 380 (1946); Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U. S. 1, 21 (1948). The fear of race conflict is, of course, an insufficient legal basis for depriving a person of his constitutional rights by racial segregation. Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U. S. 60, 81 (1917); City of Birmingham v. Monk, 185 F. (2d) 859 (C.A. 5th, 1950), cert. den. 341 U. S. 940 (1951); Mitchell v. United States, 313 U. S. 80, 97 (1941). The problem of potential race conflict, if any, should instead be solved by education and by enforcing without racial discrimination the laws against violence and disorderly conduct. But any uneasiness on this score is wholly dissipated when we observe the success of integration in the Topeka public schools beyond the sixth grade, the happy experience of the integrated elementary schools on Federal areas throughout the South,[10] and the current experience in many other fields of human relations.[11]

[10] See Washington Post, p. 3-B (Oct. 14, 1951); cf. President Truman's pocket veto of Enrolled Bill H. R. 5411, 82nd Cong. because it would have required segregation in these now integrated public elementary schools in the South. Message to Congress, Nov. 2, 1951, 97 Cong. Rec. 13787-13788.

Even if the segregation in this case is measured, not by any of these tests, but by that touchstone of racism, the outmoded doctrine of Plessy v. Ferguson,[12] the segregation in this case can not be sustained. Plessy did not say that all segregation is valid. It required that a legislative racial distinction "must be reasonable," and asserted that that question could be determined "with reference to the established usages, customs and traditions of the people, and with a view to the promotion of their comfort, and the preservation of the public peace and good order" (163 U. S. at 550). But what might have been "reasonable", even on that basis, in the Deep South in 1896 when Jim Crow and the Ku Klux Klan were in their hey-day is certainly not reasonable in the law-abiding and enlightened City of Topeka, Kansas, in 1952. Furthermore, as already shown, segregation in the Topeka schools does not promote the "comfort" of its citizenry, and is totally irrelevant to the "preservation of the public peace and good order." It rests only on prejudice, a factor plainly unreasonable under the Constitution. Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, 374 (1886).

On the other hand, the enforced segregation in this case admittedly retards the educational and mental development of the Negro children and deprives them of equal educational opportunity. It is a discrimination with far-reaching effects. Educational qualifications are often the basis for exercising citizenship rights and participating in civil government and military affairs. One's educational level also generally affects his opportunity to secure better employment and housing, to enjoy improved recreation, to create in literature and science, to achieve success in business and industry, and to obtain the decencies and amenities of social relations in a democracy. Moreover, segregation in schools stimulates and deepens divisiveness in our population, obstructs efforts to dissolve prejudices through the process of education and voluntary adjustments, and, by providing propaganda for our enemies abroad, adversely affects our relations with other countries. These ill effects, not only on the Negro children but also on the community and the Nation, should be weighed against the insubstantial reasons of "usages, customs and traditions" which are based wholly on prejudice. On such weighing, it is clear that the segregation in this case is unreasonable and therefore, even under the Plessy test, unconstitutional.

IV. The Road Ahead.

Segregated and unequal education, unfortunately, will not disappear overnight. The backlog of deficiency, the habits of the people, the accumulated patterns of residential segregation, and other factors remain as significant obstacles. But the elimination of State-imposed restrictions of law will provide opportunity for voluntary adjustment by the people. Intercultural problems which the abolition of segregation in education will raise in some schools will not be insoluble problems. Democratic education has the capacity to meet them. In any event, none of these possible inter-group problems will approach the magnitude of those raised by enforced segregation which discriminates against children of the minority group in violation of the Constitutional guarantee of "equal protection of the laws."

Appeal from the United States District Court for the District of Kansas.

MOTION FOR LEAVE TO FILE BRIEF AMICUS CURIAE.

To the Honorable Chief Justice and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The undersigned as counsel for and on behalf of American Federation of Teachers, respectfully moves this Honorable Court for leave to file the accompanying brief as Amicus Curiae. Consent has been given by counsel for appellants and appellees. The letters giving such consent accompany this brief.

The American Federation of Teachers is an organization of more than 350 locals of 60,000 teachers throughout the country, committed to a policy of "Democracy in Education—Education for Democracy". Its membership consists chiefly of classroom teachers who do the actual work of teaching the children in the nation's schools.

In its own affairs it is committed to a practice of complete equality and non-segregation between teachers of every race. Its Constitution provides:

> "Section 11 (of Article III). No discrimination shall ever be shown toward individual members, or applicants for membership because of race * * *."

It has worked unceasingly throughout its history, and with greater intensity in recent years, for the abolition of all forms of discrimination and segregation in education based on racial differences.

Its members, as shown by the proceedings of its national conventions, have repeatedly asserted a fixed opinion that segregated school systems are a basic violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

BRIEF OF THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF TEACHERS AS AMICUS CURIAE.

The American Federation of Teachers submits this brief as amicus curiae in view of the great importance to democracy and the cause of education of the constitutional issue involved in these cases.

Opinions Below.

Statutes Involved.

The opinions below and the statutes involved are set out in the brief of the appellants.

Question Presented.

The general question presented by this appeal is whether the State of Kansas is violating the mandates of the Fourteenth Amendment by its practice of maintaining separate schools for the education of white and colored children.

Statement.

This is a class action in which plaintiffs seek a decree declaring Section 72-1724 of the General Statutes of Kansas, 1949 to be unconstitutional insofar as it empowers the Board of Education of the City of Topeka "to organize and maintain separate schools for the education of white and colored children."

Pursuant to this statute, the City of Topeka, Kansas, has established and maintains a segregated system of schools for the first six grades. The City of Topeka is one school district. The district maintains eighteen schools for white children and four for colored children.

The case was heard by a three judge statutory court. The court found as a fact that the facilities in the schools for colored children were substantially equal. Hence the issue here is whether segregation of children in the grade schools is per se a denial of equal protection of the laws.

Summary of Argument.

In this brief amicus curiae the American Federation of Teachers will argue that segregation in the schools violates basic principles of the educational process; that Negroes forced by state law to attend segregated schools are, by virtue of such segregation denied the equal protection of the laws, in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment.

BLEED THROUGH

ARGUMENT.

I.

The Statute of Kansas, providing for segregation of students in the Public Schools, violates the requirements of the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The doctrine of "Separate but Equal" facilities is fallacious.

The Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution, in Section 1, provides:

> "All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

The Fourteenth Amendment made Negroes citizens of the United States and was intended further to protect them fully in the exercise of their rights and privileges. To make sure that this intent was fully known, Congress refused to readmit Southern States or seat their representatives until the states accepted the Fourteenth Amendment.

Its adoption, however, did not stop the practice of segregation in the Southern States, and when that issue was presented to this Court in 1896, in Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537, 550 (1896), involving a Louisiana statute which required separation of Negro and white passengers, this Court said:

> ". . . We cannot say that a law which authorizes or even requires the separation of the two races in public > conveyances is unreasonable, or more obnoxious to the Fourteenth Amendment than the acts of Congress requiring separate schools for colored children in the District of Columbia, the constitutionality of which does not seem to have been questioned, or the corresponding acts of state legislatures."

In Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, registrar, 305 U. S. 337, 349, this Court said:

> "The admissibility of laws separating the races in the enjoyment of privileges afforded by the State rests wholly upon the equality of the privileges which the laws give to the separated groups within the State."

Recently, the doctrine of "separate by equal" facilities expressed in the Plessy and Gaines cases was held to be a menace to American democracy and indefensible by the President's Committee on Civil Rights which unequivocally advocated that it be eliminated. In its report, the Committee said:

> "The separate but equal doctrine has failed in three important respects. First, it is inconsistent with the fundamental equalitarianism of the American way of life in that it marks groups with the brand of inferior status. Secondly, where it has been followed, the results have been separate and unequal facilities for minority peoples. Finally it has kept people apart despite incontrovertible evidence that an environment favorable to civil rights is fostered whenever groups are permitted to live and work together. There is no adequate defense of segregation."

Furthermore, recent decisions of this Court enunciate principles in conflict with the rationale of the Plessy and Gaines cases. These include: Takahashi v. Fish & Game Commission, 332 U. S. 410; Oyama v. California, 332 U. S. 633, 640, 646 (1948); Sipuel v. Board of Regents of the University of Oklahoma, 332 U. S. 631 (1948); Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U. S. 1 (1948).

BLEED THROUGH

In the Shelley case, this court, in considering private agreements to exclude persons of designated race or color from the use or occupancy of real estate for residential purposes and holding that it was violative of the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment for state courts to enforce them said (at p. 23):

> "The historical context in which the Fourteenth Amendment became a part of the Constitution should not be forgotten. Whatever else the framers sought to achieve, it is clear that the matter of primary concern was the establishment of equality in the enjoyment of basic civil and political rights and the preservation of those rights from discriminatory action on the part of the States based on considerations of race or color."

These principles cast doubt on the soundness of the rule laid down in the Plessy and Gaines cases. We submit that it should no longer be followed.

Nowhere has the fallacy of the doctrine of "separate but equal" facilities been more apparent than in the grade and high schools of the country. Elsewhere, in this brief we shall point out the sociological effects of this practice.

In Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629, 70 S. Ct. Rep. 848, the court held that a separate law school established by Texas for Negro students could not be the equal of the University of Texas Law School.

In McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U. S. 637, 70 S. Ct. Rep. 851, the court held that the requirements of state law that the instruction of a Negro graduate student in the University of Oklahoma be "upon a segregated basis" deprived the appellant in that case of his personal and present right to the equal protection of the laws.

There is no reason in experience for applying a different logic to children in grade and high schools. As the court there said, our society grows increasingly complex and our need for trained leaders increases correspondingly.

We cannot give separate training to two segments of society and then expect that some magic will merge the individual from these segments into equal citizens having equal opportunities.

It is a mockery to say that those who aspire to teach and lead must have equal opportunity regardless of race, and still condemn to inequality those they are to teach and lead.

Ninety years of segregated schools demand the historical judgment that separate facilities are inevitably unequal and are not the way to equal opportunity.

In the segregated school system the growing citizen never has the chance to show his equal ability; he never has the > "opportunity to secure acceptance by his fellow students on his own merits." McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U. S. 637, 641.

He must wait until he has finished what schooling he gets before he enters the competition. For him "the personal and present right to the equal protection of the laws" is of as great practical importance as for the graduate student.

The Fourteenth Amendment is not for law students and postgraduates alone. It is meaningless if it does not apply to all children from the first day they enter the public schools.

To paraphrase the decision in the Shelley case, it seems to us that the segregation of students in public education as required by the Kansas Statute, violates the primary object of the Fourteenth Amendment: ". . . the establishment of equality in the enjoyment of basic civil and political rights and the preservation of those rights from discriminatory action on the part of the States based on considerations of race or color."

II.

Segregation in public schools inevitably results in inferior educational opportunities for the Negro.

Commenting on the study of Dr. John Norton and Dr. Eugene Lawler—Public School Expenditures (1944) W. Harden Hughes states:

> "The contrasts in support of white and Negro schools are appalling . . . the median expenditure per standard classroom unit in schools for white children is $1,160 as compared with $476 for Negro children. Only 2.56% of class rooms in the white schools fall below the $500 cost level while 52.59% of the class rooms for Negro children are below this level."[1]
>
> "The state supported institutions of higher learning for Negroes are far inferior" states Charles S. Mangum, Jr., "to their sister institutions for whites. Most of the inequalities which have been noted herein with respect to the public schools for whites and Negroes are also present in the Negro normal and technical schools. . . . There is hardly one among them that could compare with any good white college in the same area."[2]

Statistics on vocational education in the land grant schools and colleges among Negroes show:

> "that of the federal funds allotted for vocational training in 1934-35 white schools received 88.2% and Negro schools 11.8%."[3]

A recommendation of this report (1934-35) was:

> "that individuals and groups interested in the improvement of educational facilities continue and increase their efforts to promote equitability of educational opportunity and equitability in the distribution of funds without regard to race or color."[4]

In Texas, the expenditure for public schools was $1400 for whites per classroom unit and $700 for Negroes.[4] There is a corresponding discrimination in school transportation, salaries of teachers, library service and provision for training beyond the secondary school.

Several recent studies,[5] as well as many previous ones, all indicate the great disparity between the educational opportunities afforded white youth and those offered to Negro youth in the states where a segregated and discriminatory system of education prevails.

So obvious are the inequalities that in Vol. 1 of the National Survey of the Higher Education of Negroes we find this statement: "No one with a knowledge of the facts believes that Negroes enjoy all the privileges which American democracy expressly provides for the citizens of the U. S. and even for those aliens of the white race who reside among us. The question goes much deeper than the Negro citizens' legal right to equal educational opportunity. The question is whether American democracy and what we like to call the American way of life, can stand the strain of perpetuating an undemocratic situation; and whether the nation can bear the social cost of utilizing only a fraction of the potential contribution of so large a portion of the American population." [6]

The Constitution is a living instrument, and a "separate but equal" doctrine based upon antiquated considerations, should not, at this time, and in this advanced era, be permitted to perpetuate a situation which denies full equality to Negroes in the pursuit of education.

III.

Segregation in public schools deprives the Negro student of an important element of the education process and he is thereby denied the equal educational opportunities mandated by the Fourteenth Amendment.

The practice of segregation in the field of education is a denial of education itself. Education means more than the physical school room and the books it contains, and the teacher who instructs. It includes the learning that comes from free and full association with other students in the school. To restrict that association is to deny full and equal opportunities in the learning process. To restrict that association is to deny the constitutional guarantee.

Psychologists show us that learning is an emotional as well as an intellectual process: that it is social as well as individual, and is best secured in an environment which encourages and stimulates the best effort of the individual and holds out the hope that this best effort will be accepted and used by society.

From infancy to adulthood the most satisfactory personality development occurs when the individual:

a. feels he is accepted and wanted by his community

[6] Socio-Economic Approach to Educational Problems, Misc. No. 6, Vol. 1, p. 1, Federal Security Agency, U. S. Office of Education, Wash., 1942.

b. secures aid and encouragement in his activities

c. has the satisfaction of contributing to the group without too many frustrating experiences

d. receives the approval of the group or some evidence of recognition.

"Another obvious fact about human development is that it is greatly facilitated by social contacts. . . . Social contacts make possible the enlargement of personal experience by fusing into it the accumulated experiences of the race."[7] (Here human race is intended.)

"More recently psychologists and other students of education have gained a livelier appreciation of the fact that learning does not take place merely because there exists an intelligence or mind. The physical condition of boys and girls, their emotional responses both in school and out, all the environmental factors which impinge upon them have influence upon their growth and development."[8]

"The security needs of children (and adults too) are more numerous and complicated than the elimination of gross fears suggests. They seem to be related to a larger but more subtle need which may be here labeled as the need for orientation. A person finds it desirable to know where he is in the world and how he stands with his fellows. To be 'lost' in either respect is to be in an uncomfortable frame of mind. Not to be spatially, temporally and socially oriented is to be deprived of the prime conditions for effective learning and growth."[9]

In every situation there is the inter-relation of the individual to his group—which is one that increases with his maturity. First it is the family, then the local community, then the state, the nation, and finally the entire world. At no stage of development should any barriers be erected to prevent the individual from moving from a narrower group to a larger one, particularly barriers on race. As Lewin states:

> "The group to which an individual belongs is the ground on which he stands, which gives or denies him social status, gives or denies him security and help. The firmness or weakness of this ground might not be consciously perceived, just as the firmness of the physical ground on which we tread is not always thought of. Dynamically, however, the firmness and clearness of this ground determine what the individual wishes to do, what he can do, and how he will do it. This is equally true of the social ground as of the physical."[10]

Again he states:

> "It should be clear to the social scientist that it is hopeless to cope with this problem (discrimination) by providing sufficient self esteem for members of minority groups as individuals. The discrimination which these individuals experience is not directed against them as individuals, but as group members and only by raising their self esteem as group members to the normal level can a remedy be produced."[11]

An interesting survey of the opinion of social scientists on the effects of enforced segregation was made by Drs. Max Deutscher and Isidor Chein through a questionnaire[12] to 849 social scientists in all parts of the country. The questionnaire was answered by 571.

> "Ninety per cent of the total sample express the opinion that enforced segregation has detrimental effects on the segregated groups."[13]

> "Eighty-three per cent of the respondents believe that enforced segregation has detrimental psychological effects on the group which enforces segregation."[14]

A few quotations from the social scientists make clear their views: "Feelings of not being wanted, of being classified as inferiors, of being assigned to low places are destructive to personality and development and injurious alike to slave and master."[15]

> "Clinical experience and experimental evidence point unmistakably to the conclusion that segregation implies a value judgment which in turn arouses hostility in the segregated and guilt feelings in the segregator. The effect is to set up a vicious circle making for group conflict."[16]

> "I don't see how anyone could question the statement that power over others—to segregate or any other power—has a psychological effect on both parties or that this effect is bad in any sense for the less powerful groups. The more powerful group may like the effect it has on itself in short term values, but hatred, rebellion, or dispair are attitudes they have aroused toward themselves and they will always have to cope with these results sooner or later unless they can practically eradicate the whole minority as Europeans did with the American Indian."[17]

If education can be made available to all so that each may develop to the fullest and give his contribution to society, we will find a peaceful way—rather than one of human destruction and tragedy—to bring freedom and justice to peoples.

The American Federation of Teachers believes that segregated and discriminatory education is undemocratic and contrary both to sound educational development as well as to the basic law of the land—the United States Constitution. We subscribe to the principle that democratic education provides a total environment which will enable the individual to develop to his capacity, physically, emotionally, intellectually and spiritually.

For such training to be fully effective, it is essential that each individual participate, without barriers of race, creed, or national origin, as a full fledged member in the home, the community, the state and the nation.

Accordingly, any restriction, particularly in the form of segregated and discriminatory schooling, which prevents the interplay of ideas, personalities, information and attitudes, impedes a democratic education and ultimately prevents a working democracy.

Conclusion.

Segregation of Negroes in public schools in any of our States inevitably results in depriving Negroes of educational opportunities provided by those States for white citizens. Negroes in such States are thereby denied the equal protection of the laws mandated by the Fourteenth Amendment. This Court should end these violations of the constitutional mandate by reversing the judgment in this case and granting the appellants the relief they pray for.

BRIEF OF AMERICAN JEWISH CONGRESS AS AMICUS CURIAE

STATEMENT OF INTEREST

This brief amicus curiae is submitted with the consent of the parties.

The American Jewish Congress is an organization committed to the principle that the destinies of all Americans are indissolubly linked and that any act which unjustly injures one group necessarily injures all. Out of this firmly held belief, the American Jewish Congress created its Commission on Law and Social Action in 1945, in part "to fight every manifestation of racism and to promote the civil and political equality of all minorities in America."

Believing as we do that Jewish interests are inseparable from the interests of justice, the American Jewish Congress cannot remain impassive or disinterested when persecution, discrimination or humiliation is inflicted upon any human being because of his race, religion, color, national origin or ancestry. Through the thousands of years of our tragic history we have learned one lesson well: the persecution at any time of any minority portends the shape and intensity of persecution of all minorities.

There is, however, an additional reason for our interest. The special concern of the Jewish people in human rights derives from an immemorial tradition which proclaims the common origin and end of all mankind and affirms, under the highest sanction of faith and human aspirations, the common and inalienable rights of all men. The struggle for human dignity and liberty is thus of the very substance of the Jewish tradition.

We submit this brief amicus because we are convinced that the policy of segregation has had a blighting effect upon Americans and consequently upon American democratic institutions. We believe that the doctrine of "separate but equal" has engendered hatred, fear and ignorance. We recognize in this triumvirate our greatest enemy in the struggle for human freedom. But our concern must not be construed as limited to minorities alone. The treatment of minorities in a community is indicative of its political and moral standards and ultimately determinative of the happiness of all its members. Our immediate objective here is to secure unconditional equality for Americans of Negro ancestry. Our ultimate objective in this case, as in all others, is to preserve the dignity of all men so that we may achieve full equality in a free society.

BLEED THROUGH

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

The City of Topeka, pursuant to authority granted it by the General Statutes of Kansas of 1949 (Ch. 72-1724), maintains a segregated system of schools for the first six grades. The appellants, adult and infant Negroes, filed a class suit in the U. S. District Court against the Topeka School Board seeking a declaration of unconstitutionality and an injunction restraining the enforcement of the Kansas statutes and the segregation instituted thereunder, on the ground that such segregation violated the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution in that (1) Negro schools were inferior in facilities and (2) segregation, in and of itself, constituted an inequality in educational advantage. The State of Kansas intervened as a defendant.

A three-judge Court rejected appellant's first contention finding that the Negro schools were substantially equal to those allotted to whites (R. 245), a finding which appellants here do not challenge. Although the court found that segregation of white and colored children in public schools had "a detrimental effect upon the colored children" (R. 245), it considered itself bound by this Court's opinion in Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537, and therefore also rejected appellant's second contention (R. 243-244). Appellants on direct appeal are now seeking a review of that decision. The decision below is unreported.

THE QUESTION TO WHICH THIS BRIEF IS ADDRESSED

This brief is addressed solely to whether the requirement of equality contained in the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution is satisfied by affording "separate but equal" public grade school facilities to Negro and white children.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

When a state establishes racially segregated public grade schools, it thereby perpetuates inequality between the races and discriminates against the Negro race in violation of the "equal protection" clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

A. State imposed segregation stems from a theory of superiority of the white race over the Negro race inherited as a remnant of the institution of slavery.

B. The social inequality which was one of the results of slavery changes in both degree and nature when it is incorporated in the laws of a state. Such incorporation places the power of the state behind the inequality, freezes the unequal status and impedes its gradual change. The inequality, which thus receives the imprimatur of the state, causes a denial of the equal protection of the laws if it results in an inequality of values in the facilities provided by the state or causes oppression of a race.

C. (1) Segregated public grade schools do adopt a pre-existing inequality and place a badge of inferiority on the Negro race. Since the value of facilities is determined in part by the standing in the community of those who use them, the result is an inequality of value in the public school facilities provided for the separate races.

BLEED THROUGH

(2) In addition, because of the adoption of the pre-existing inequality, the Negro race suffers psychic injury in the segregated school system.

ARGUMENT

When a state establishes racially segregated public grade schools, it thereby perpetuates inequality between the races and discriminates against the Negro race in violation of the "equal protection" clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The segregated public school system of Topeka, Kansas, was found constitutional by the court below under what is known as the "separate but equal" doctrine. That doctrine holds that the "equal protection" clause of the Fourteenth Amendment is not violated when a state agency provides separate facilities for its white and Negro citizens as long as the facilities are equal (R. 240-244). We believe that that doctrine is erroneous on several counts. Here, however, we shall focus attention on only one of its aspects. It is our position that state-imposed racial segregation in public grade schools violates the Fourteenth Amendment because it adopts a classification based on concepts and practices of inequality and, by that adoption, contributes to, extends and deepens the discrimination resulting from the inequality and incorporates that discrimination in the schooling which it provides.

A. The Pre-Existing Inequality of Negroes and Whites

State-imposed segregation stems directly from a vestigial theory of the superiority and inferiority of races inherited as a remnant of the institution of slavery. With the freeing of slaves, attempts were made by the dominant white group to preserve its position of ascendancy by the enactment of discriminatory legislation. Immediately after the Civil War the southern states adopted laws limiting the rights of Negroes to own property, to institute law suits and to testify in judicial proceedings. They imposed different penalties on Negroes and whites for the same offenses and otherwise placed the freedmen under legal restraints. Stephenson, G. T., Race Distinctions in American Law (1910), pp. 35-66; Frazier, E. F., The Negro in the United States (1949), pp. 126-127. These "Black Codes," as they were called, were a plain reflection of the earlier attitude that Negro slaves, and those descended from them, "had no rights which the white man was bound to respect." Dred Scott v. Sandford, 60 U. S. (19 How.) 393, 407 (1857). "It required little knowledge of human nature to anticipate that those who had long been regarded as an inferior and subject race would, when suddenly raised to the rank of citizenship, be looked upon with jealousy and positive dislike, and that State laws might be enacted or enforced to perpetuate the distinctions that had before existed." Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U. S. 303, 306 (1879).

We shall show in the following sections, first, that the Fourteenth Amendment prohibits state action which incorporates, and thereby strengthens and entrenches, this pre-existing inequality and, second, that state-imposed racial segregation in public grade schools has that effect.

B. The Constitutional Significance of State-Imposed Racial Segregation on the Lines of a Pre-Existing Social Inequality

The Fourteenth Amendment was intended to and did invalidate the gross discrimination of the Black Codes. Slaughter House Cases, 83 U. S. 36, 70 (1872). It may be assumed, at least for the purposes of this case, that it did not lay upon the states the affirmative obligation to undo all the results of slavery. Thus, the Amendment did not reach whatever social inequality remained. Private individuals and institutions were free to discriminate as they chose.

Specifically, no question would have arisen under the Amendment in the area of education if the states had simply refrained from providing public schools. But if they did provide public schools, they were required to do so in a manner which did not cause unequal treatment.

We pass over the question whether the Amendment would have been violated if the creation of public, racially-segregated schools had had no effect on the existing racial inequality. It is unnecessary to consider that question because, we submit, when government gives official sanction to pre-existing social inequality, its action causes a change in both the degree and the nature of the inequality and incorporates it into its own activities.

This change takes place because once a social classification based on group inferiority is formally adopted by the state, the ensuing official inferiority in turn intensifies and deepens the social inequality from which it stems. As long as law is not called into play to shape conduct, gradual changes in attitude can bring about corresponding changes in conduct patterns. These changes, in turn, further the attitude changes. Once the law intervenes, however, gradual spontaneous change becomes impossible.*

Suppose, for example, that Kansas did not maintain a public school system and had no laws requiring segregation in education. As already noted, privately operated schools would be free to segregate and even to exclude racial groups entirely. Those private groups, however, who rejected racial inequality would also be free to act according to their principles. Most important, those who opposed segregation would be able to change the situation gradually by persuading one school authority at a time to change its policy. Each success they achieved would demonstrate the feasibility of non-segregated schools and thereby increase their chances of success with other schools.

On the other hand, when the state places the policy of segregation in its laws, it freezes the social inequality in whose mold the laws are cast. More than that, the laws eliminate the free play of individualism and force all, without exception, to conform their conduct to the caste system. It is then no longer possible to urge gradual change or to attempt step-by-step improvement. The statute becomes a bulwark against dissentient opinion, persuasion and even economic pressure.

An additional result of segregation laws is to give the otherwise inarticulate social feeling of racial superiority the sanction of official regulation. The feeling ac-

* The manner in which the law "maintains one set of values against another" (Pound, Roscoe, The Task of the Law (1944), p. 25) has been intensively studied in recent years. For summaries of the findings, see Berger, Morroe, Equality by Statute (1952), pp. 170-193; Maslow, Will, Prejudice, Discrimination, and the Law, The Annals, May 1951, pp. 9-17.

BLEED THROUGH

quires a concreteness and assertiveness which it would not otherwise possess. The stricter the regulation, the stronger and more articulate the feeling of social distance becomes. This Court itself took note of that fact when it characterized a law excluding Negroes from juries as a "stimulant to . . . race prejudice." Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U. S. 303, 308 (1879).

The distinction between private and public schools just discussed finds a close parallel in Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U. S. 1 (1948). This Court there noted that the Constitution is not violated where "the States have merely abstained from action, leaving private individuals free to impose such discriminations as they see fit." 334 U. S., at 19. Where, however, the "imprimatur of the State" is placed on the discrimination, the Fourteenth Amendment becomes applicable and it makes no difference that "the particular pattern of discrimination, which the State has enforced, was defined initially by the terms of a private agreement." 334 U. S., at 20.

So here the "full panoply of state power" (334 U. S., at 19) has been placed behind the inequality inherent in segregation. The state power is brought to bear in two ways. It enforces and extends the pre-existing social inequality (supra, pp. 7-9), and, at the same time, provides facilities which, because of that social inequality, are unequal in value (infra, pp. 11-12).

The barrier to change set up by segregation laws is the same in nature as that created by the state-enforced restrictive covenants condemned in the Shelley case. The Court there found beyond the reach of the Constitution mere "gentlemen's agreements" which derived no strength from the state. The discrimination adopted in those agreements, like that adopted by privately operated schools, can be whittled away gradually. Institutions may be persuaded, by argument or pressure, to depart from established patterns. The vice of judicial enforcement of restrictive covenants lay in the fact that it froze patterns of discrimination and placed them beyond the reach of erosion; "but for the active intervention of the state courts" (334 U. S., at 19), change would have been possible. In the same way, segregation statutes use the authority of the state to preserve the inequality and discrimination which they incorporate.

This Court recognized in the Plessy case that the statute there considered did conform to existing social attitudes. It noted that the statute was enacted "with reference to the established usages, customs and traditions of the people . . ." 163 U. S., at 550. Where the Court erred, we submit, was in holding in effect that the state could ignore the status of inferiority in which those "usages" placed the Negro and could also ignore the reenforcing effect which its legislation had on that status.

In any event, where as here, the state does more and provides facilities to which the state-reenforced inequality attaches, the violation of the Constitution is plain. As we shall now show, segregation in public grade schools, by imposing a badge of inferiority on the Negro race, causes inequality in the facilities made available to it and results in oppression of that race within the public school system. We submit that the Fourteenth Amendment prohibits such use of the state's power to maintain inequality in public facilities.

C. The Effect of Racial Segregation in Public Grade Schools

(1) Enforced segregation in public grade schools stamps the Negro with a badge of inferiority and thereby renders inferior the facilities allocated to him by the state.

It can hardly be disputed that an official regulation declaring that a group is inferior and consequently confining it to separate schools would be discriminatory. That much was virtually conceded in the Plessy decision when the Court characterized as a "fallacy . . . the assumption that the enforced separation of the two races stamps the colored race with a badge of inferiority." 163 U. S., at 551. It thereby implied that a different result would have been reached if the contrary were true.

An official declaration that the Negro race is inferior to the white and must therefore be confined to separate schools would necessarily depreciate the value of the Negro schools in the eyes of the community. This is because the value and desirability of property depends not only upon its intrinsic qualities but also upon its association with persons enjoying a certain reputation. The desirability of a beautiful resort may be lessened by its being visited by people deemed of "low" social standing. Differences in value of this nature are significant under the Fourteenth Amendment as this Court recognized when it condemned segregation in state law schools because of differences in "those qualities which are incapable of objective measurement but which make for greatness in a law school," including "standing in the community, traditions and prestige." Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629, 634 (1950).

We do not have here, of course, an express declaration by the State of Kansas that Negroes are inferior to whites.* Yet the same effect is achieved if a state establishes public school segregation along the lines of a preexisting social inequality. It is plain that that is what public school segregation does.

Examination of the pattern of segregation laws reveals plainly that they are designed not to prevent all contact between the races but to prevent contact on the basis of equality. It is the social definition of the situation that determines its treatment in both law and custom. Merely "shaking a black hand may be very repulsive to a white man if he surmises that a colored man conceives of the situation as implying equality." Johnson, Patterns of Negro Segregation (1943), p. 208. Those who insist upon the caste system in our society freely and unstintingly agree to the ritual of equal physical facilities so long as somehow there is also an accompanying communication that the Negro is inferior and is to remain so.

---

*Other states having segregation laws have given express recognition to racial inequality in decisions holding that it is libelous per se to write that a white man is a Negro (Upton v. Times-Democrat Pub. Co., 104 La. 141 (1900); Collins v. Oklahoma State Hospital, 76 Okla. 229 (1919); Hargrove v. Okla. Press Pub. Co., 130 Okla. 76 (1928); Flood v. News and Courier Co., 71 S. C. 112 (1905); Stultz v. Cousins, 242 Fed. 794 (C.C.A. 6, 1917); see also Jones v. Polk & Co., 190 Ala. 243 (1913); Atlanta Journal Co. v. Farmer, 48 Ga. App. 273 (1934); Wright v. F. W. Woolworth Co., 281 Ill. App. 495 (1935); Williams v. Riddle, 145 Ky. 459 (1911); O'Connor v. Dallas Cotton Exchange, 153 S. W. (2) 266 (Tex., 1941); Mangum, The Legal Status of the Negro, 1940, at p. 18) and in cases awarding damages to white passengers who are forced to ride in Jim Crow cars (M.K.T. Railway Co. of Texas v. Ball, 25 Tex. Civil App. 500 (1901); Louisville and N.R. Co. v. Ritchel, 148 Ky. 701 (1912); Chicago R. I. and P. Ry. Co. v. Allison, 120 Ark. 54 (1915)).

BLEED THROUGH

Segregation laws provide the ready vocabulary for that communication. In at least one respect, this can be seen in the segregation laws themselves. Ten Southern states expressly exempt nurses or other attendants from the laws requiring segregation on railroads (Mangum, The Legal Status of the Negro (1940), pp. 188-189) and three of these disclose the intent of this exception by limiting it to "colored" attendants. Florida Statutes (1941), sec. 352.03; Georgia Code Ann. (1935), sec. 18-209; No. Car. Gen. Stat. (1943), sec. 60-94.

Even where the statutes are not so disingenuous the purpose is clear. By segregation "racial and cultural differences between southern whites and slaves were translated into terms of unquestionable superiority and inferiority." Johnson, op. cit., p. 158. According to Dollard, Caste and Class in a Southern Town (1937), p. 98, the sole importance of segregation is to give whites, no matter how low in the social scale, a sense of power and importance. Negroes correspondingly must receive a position and a sense of inferiority. This primary role of segregation statutes is reflected in the candid admission of a Kentucky court:

> "It is also beyond dispute that the sentiment reflected in this legislation and in these opinions does not find the end or the perfection of its purpose in mere race separation alone. It goes much further in that, as is shown in the general feeling everywhere prevailing, the Negro, while respected and protected in his place, is not and cannot be a fit associate for white girls or the social equal of the white race. To conditions like these that are everywhere about them as a part of the social order and domestic economy of the state, courts cannot shut their eyes. They must

> . . . notice . . . the position of the races and the attitude of the white race toward the Negro." Axton Fisher Tobacco Co. v. The Evening Post, 169 Ky. 64 (1916).

That the vocabulary of segregation is effectively understood by the entire community cannot be disputed at this date. Segregation provides a graphic and literal solution to the demand of the white world that Negroes be kept "in their place." To the whites in the community the enforced separation of races, as we have shown, is clearly understood as a symbolic affirmation of white dominance, dominance which, to keep itself alive, demands as tribute the continuous performance of the racial etiquette. See Doyle, The Etiquette of Race Relations (1937); Johnson, Patterns of Negro Segregation (1943), p. 158; McWilliams, Race Discrimination and the Law, Science and Society, Vol. IX, No. 1 (1945). "In this magical sphere of the white man's mind, the Negro is inferior, totally independent of rational proofs or disproofs. And he is inferior in a deep and mystical sense. The 'reality' of his inferiority is the white man's own indubitable sensing of it and that feeling applies to every single Negro . . . the Negro is believed to be stupid, immoral, diseased, lazy, incompetent, and dangerous—dangerous to the white man's virtue and social order." Myrdal, An American Dilemma (1944), p. 100. Under these conditions "it is fallacious to say . . . that the intention and effect [of segregation] is not to impose any badge of inferiority . . . When a Negro workingman or woman is seated in the third seat of a street car on St. Charles Avenue in New Orleans and when a white man and woman is seated on the fourth seat, separated only by a bit of wire mesh ten inches high on the back of the third seat this is a 'separation' that is merely a symbolic assertion of social superiority, a 'ceremonial' celebration." McGovney, Racial Residential Segregation by State Court Enforcement of Restrictive Agreements, Covenants or Conditions in Deeds is Unconstitutional, 33 Calif. L. Rev. 5, 27 (1945).

BLEED THROUGH

Similarly, Negroes appreciate the implication of segregation (Stouffer, Studies in Social Psychology in World War II, Vol. 1, p. 566), resent its slur (Moton, What the Negro Thinks (1929), pp. 238-239), and resist it as a none too subtle mechanism for anchoring them in inferiority (Davis and Doliard, Children of Bondage (1940), p. 245).

These effects in the field of segregated education are well shown by the record in this case. Dr. Louisa Holt, a social psychologist, testified as follows on the impact of school segregation on the personality of the Negro child (R. 169-170):

> "The fact that it is enforced, that it is legal, I think, has more importance than the mere fact of segregation by itself does because this gives legal and official sanction to a policy which inevitably is interpreted both by white people and by negroes as denoting the inferiority of the negro group. Were it not for the sense that one group is inferior to the other, there would be no basis, and I am not granting that this is a rational basis, for such segregation."

The result of segregation has been the infusion of rigid, caste stratifications into our laws, our institutions, our conduct and our habits of perception until "the Negro is segregated in public thought as well as public carriers." Moton, What the Negro Thinks (1929), p. 55. Since both white and Negro view segregation as a method of asserting and reenforcing the inferiority of the latter and since in fact segregation statutes have that effect, this Court should not continue to maintain the erroneous proposition enunciated in Plessy v. Ferguson that laws requiring separation "do not necessarily imply the inferiority of either race to the other." 163 U. S., at 544. Rather it should find that the schools for Negroes in a segregated system cannot be regarded as the equal of those for whites in respect to their "standing in the community, traditions and prestige." Sweatt case, supra. The Fourteenth Amendment plainly condemns the allocation to separate races of such unequal facilities.

(2) Enforced separation does oppress the Negro community.

Since segregation laws are based on a concept of inequality, place a badge of inferiority on the segregated race, and intensify and extend the existing stratification, it is not surprising that, in addition to depreciating the value of the separate facilities for Negroes, they have harmful results for the segregated group. Contrary to the assumption made in the Plessy case, segregation does cause "oppression of a particular class." 163 U. S., at 550. If proof of this were necessary, it has been supplied by the developed techniques of the social scientists, all of whom are agreed that segregation has profoundly adverse effects on the Negro community. This is particularly true of segregation in the public schools. Segregation in Public Schools—A Violation of "Equal Protection," 50 Yale L. J. 1059, 1061; Gallagher, American Caste and the Negro College (1938); Davis and Dollard, Children of Bondage (1940); Woofter, The Basis of Racial Adjustment

BLEED THROUGH

(1925); Bond, The Education of the Negro in the American Social Order (1934).

A survey of professional sociological, anthropological and psychological opinion on this subject has been conducted by Drs. Max Deutscher and Isidor Chein of the Commission on Community Interrelations of the American Jewish Congress. Eight hundred and forty-nine social scientists were polled, including the entire membership of the American Ethnological Society, the Division of Personality and Social Psychology of the American Psychological Association, and all of the members of the American Sociological Society who listed race relations or social psychology as their major field of interest. Returns were received from 517, or 61% of the number sent. 90% of the respondents indicated their opinion that enforced segregation has detrimental psychological effects on segregated groups even though equal facilities are provided. 4% failed to answer the item and only 2% indicated that segregation is free of such detrimental effects. Deutscher and Chein, The Psychological Effects of Enforced Segregation: A Survey of Social Science Opinion, 26 The Journal of Psychology 259 (1948).

On the basis of what they have seen and know, these social scientists united in rejecting the "separate but equal" doctrine as a serviceable formula. In responding, many of them amplified their answers with additional comment. Those who conducted the survey remark that "the gist of these comments was the emphasis on the essential irrelevance of the physical attributes of the facilities furnished." Deutscher and Chein, op. cit., supra, at p. 280. The comments are quoted extensively in the article.

The professional opinions expressed in the Deutscher-Chein study are reiterated in the expert testimony given in the case at bar which formed the basis of the trial court's conclusion that "segregation has a detrimental effect upon the colored children" (R. 245-246). For example, Dr. Hugh W. Speer, Chairman of the Department of Education at the University of Kansas, testified that regardless of the physical facilities apportioned to the Negro and white children, the colored child always received an inferior education in a segregated school since he lacked the opportunity "to learn his personal adjustments, his social adjustments and his citizenship skills in the presence of a cross-section of the population" (R. 126).

Dr. Speer was here taking note of the very point stressed by this Court in Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629, 634 (1949) and McLaurin v. Oklahoma, 339 U. S. 637, 641 (1949). It was there held that the absence of the opportunity for contact with a group of persons representative of those among whom the student will eventually practice his profession constitutes, in the case of education on the professional level, an inequality in violation of the equal protection clause. Clearly in the case at bar the absence of the opportunity to associate with those with whom the Negro child must live and work in the future constitutes a deprivation of equal or greater magnitude. Many of these students will not go on to professional school and thus receive there the opportunity for such association which this Court has recently assured them.

The testimony in the instant case contains other evidence of the adverse effects of segregation on the Negro child. Both Dr. Louisa Holt (R. 170) and Dr. Horace B. English (R. 156) described the adverse effects of the feeling of inferiority engendered by segregation. Dr.

BLEED THROUGH

Wilbur B. Brookover, a professor of sociology at Michigan State College, pointed out the deep resentment induced by the discrepancy between the vaunted American creed that all are created equal and the bitter fact of subordination through segregation (R. 164-165). These conclusions find support in the Deutscher-Chein study, in which one psychologist noted:

> "The effects of this enforced status on the level of self-esteem, on feelings of inferiority and personal insecurity, the gnawing doubts and the compensatory mechanisms, the blind and helpless and hard to handle more or less suppressed retaliatory rage, the displaced aggression and ambivalence toward their own kind with a consequent sense of isolation and of not belonging anywhere—all of these and much more are bad enough, but the ambiguity of status created by a society which insists on the fact that all men are born free and equal, and then turns about and acts as if they were not is even worse. The constant reminder—and even boasting—of this equality acts like salt upon a raw wound and, more basically, places them in a profoundly ambiguous and unstructured situation. Human beings simply cannot function efficiently in such situations if they have strong feelings and are strongly motivated—as many, if not most or all, members of discriminated against minority groups are—with regard to these situations." Deutscher and Chein, op. cit., supra, at p. 272.

Psychic injury always accompanies segregation. We think it patent that as between a system which imposes such penalties and one which does not, there can be no talk of equality.

CONCLUSION

Equality is impossible in a racially segregated grade school system. The inferior status in which it freezes the Negroes and the harmful effects which it has on them are the direct results of the fact that the state lends its power, resources and authority to the caste system. Under the principles of the Shelley case, supra, such use, or abuse, of state power is a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. Regardless of where the doctrine of "white supremacy" originated, regardless of whether its tenets find explicit expression in state acts, and regardless of the avowed purpose of state-imposed racial segregation, that segregation is unconstitutional because, invoking "the full coercive power of government" (Shelley case, 334 U. S., at 19), it acts as no other force can to extend inequality, impede its elimination and incorporate it in the facilities which it provides for its citizens.

BRIEF FOR THE CONGRESS OF INDUSTRIAL ORGANIZATIONS AS AMICUS CURIAE

THE INTEREST OF THE CIO

This brief amicus curiae is submitted by the Congress of Industrial Organizations with the consent of the parties. The CIO is an organization dedicated to the maintenance and extension of our democratic rights and civil liberties and therefore has a deep interest in the elimination of segregation and discrimination from every phase of American life.

The CIO's interest is also direct and personal. The CIO, through its constituent organizations, is endeavoring to practice non-segregation and non-discrimination in the everyday functioning of union affairs. Repeatedly in the past this endeavor has been obstructed by statutes, ordinances, and regulations which require segregation in public dining places, public meeting halls, toilet facilities, etc. These laws attempt to require CIO unions to maintain "equal but separate" facilities in their own semi-public buildings, despite the avowed desire of the membership to avoid segregation in any form.

These requirements, whether in the form of regulations, statutes or ordinances, rest constitutionally on a line of reasoning and authority identical with that relied on by the court below in the present case. The disposition which this Court makes of the case is therefore of real and direct interest to the Congress of Industrial Organizations in the regulation of its activities.

THE QUESTIONS BEFORE THE COURT

In this case, we have a segregated public school system in which the District Court has found that the physical facilities, curriculum and teaching staff provided in the Negro schools are substantially equal to those provided in the white schools.

The District Court, however, did not stop with its finding as to physical facilities. It also found, in line with the virtually unanimous opinion of social scientists, that > "Segregation with the sanction of law, therefore, has a tendency to retard the educational and mental development of Negro children and deprive them of some of the benefits they would receive in a racially integrated school system." R. 246.

The District Court, nevertheless, refused to enjoin the maintenance of segregation. It held that the decisions of this Court, and, particularly Plessy v. Ferguson, required denial of the relief sought.

Hence this Court is now faced with the question which it found unnecessary to decide in Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U.S. 629, viz.: whether "Plessy v. Ferguson should be re-examined in the light of contemporary knowledge respecting the purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment and the effects of racial segregation." Id. at 636.

ARGUMENT

In this brief amicus we shall, of course, not attempt to encompass the full range of the points argued by the parties to the case. Rather we shall seek simply to point up certain aspects of the case which might otherwise escape attention.

BLEED THROUGH

I

THE DISTRICT COURT MISINTERPRETED THE SWEATT AND McLAURIN DECISIONS

Plessy v. Ferguson established the broad doctrine that laws "requiring the separation of the two races in schools, theaters, and railway carriages" do not violate the 14th Amendment if the facilities provided for the two races are equal, 163 U.S. 537, 545. In recent years the Court has been repeatedly asked to repudiate that doctrine and to hold that the mere fact of compulsory separation constitutes a denial of the equal protection of the laws, forbidden by the 14th Amendment.

The Court has, however, thus far avoided either re-affirming or rejecting the Plessy doctrine. Instead, it has treated each case on its merits and, where inequality has been found, has directed that appropriate relief be granted. Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U.S. 629; McLaurin v. Board of Regents, 339 U.S. 637. This approach was said, in the Sweatt case, to be required by the established doctrine that "this Court will decide constitutional questions only when necessary to the disposition of the case at hand and such decisions will be drawn as narrowly as possible." 339 U.S. 629, 631.

The decisions of this Court in the Sweatt and McLaurin cases were, however, interpreted by the District Court in the present case as leaving intact the Plessy doctrine that the provision of separate but physically equal school facilities would not violate the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment. Since the District Court found that the only inequality in the Topeka system was inherent in segregation itself, it concluded that the Plessy case controlled and dismissed the complaint.

This conclusion is obviously erroneous, as the decisions in the Sweatt and McLaurin cases themselves show. In those cases, the Court has implicitly limited the doctrine, if not the holding, of the Plessy case. The broad ruling of that case that the provision of "separate but equal" school systems is constitutionally valid necessarily presupposes that inequality does not arise from mere separation. If compulsory separation in itself creates inequality, "separate but equal" is a contradiction in terms. In the Sweatt and McLaurin cases, the Court did refuse to overrule the Plessy case directly. But it made it perfectly clear that it was simply refusing to reach the question of whether, as a matter of law, compulsory separation of the races always in itself means inequality. That is the question which is now before the Court.

Where it is shown that the facilities offered to Negroes in a particular case are not equal to those offered to whites because they are segregated, and also because they are physically inferior, there is no constitutional doctrine which requires that this Court shall decide the case on the second ground rather than the first. Both are claims of inequality under the laws. Either is available as the "narrow" basis for decision. The Court could hold that the inequality created by segregation was a sufficient basis for decision and therefore not reach the alleged difference in the physical facilities. Equally, it could hold that, the physical facilities being unequal, it need not pass upon the alleged inequality created by the enforced separation of the races. Or, as it did in the Sweatt case, it could look both at the difference in physical facilities and the difference in educational opportunity created by segregation itself. Neither approach is forbidden to the Court by its own doctrine of limited constitutional decision, if the decision is based upon the facts found in the record of the particular case. What is excluded by the "narrow" approach which the court has recently adopted is the broad generalization, implicit in the Plessy case, that separation in itself can never be a ground for showing inequality.

The generalization implicit in Plessy is clearly no longer the law. In the Sweatt case, the Court explicitly recognized the inequality in the educational opportunity offered to Negro law students by the State of Texas arising out of the very fact of separation. Referring to the fact that white students would be excluded from the Negro law school, the Court concluded:

> "With such a substantial and significant segment of society excluded, we cannot conclude that the education offered petitioner is substantially equal to that which he would receive if admitted to the University of Texas Law School." 339 U.S. at 634.

In McLaurin, the issue was even clearer. In that case, McLaurin was offered the use of the identical physical facilities, the same faculty, the same curriculum, the same items—in short—which the District Court referred to in its findings of physical equality in the present case. But, because these were offered under segregated restrictions the Court found, on the facts of that case, that an unconstitutional inequality existed.

What the Court did in the Sweatt and McLaurin cases, therefore, seems to us to be this. The Court made no broad generalization as to whether compulsory segregation in itself constituted a violation of the 14th Amendment. The Court did not hold, at that time, that "separate" facilities were invalid. But it also did not hold that "equal but separate" facilities were valid. The Court in effect said that inequality can be created by compulsory segregation, and held as a matter of law that segregation per se created inequality in graduate and legal education. As to other kinds of education—and, indeed, as to other facilities than education which are provided by the state or regulated by it—the Court expressed no opinion.

In the present case public school education is before the Court. And the case comes here with an express finding that segregation in the public schools does create inequality. Unless the Court is prepared to rule that such a finding cannot stand as a matter of law, we submit that the Sweatt and McLaurin cases necessarily require that the decision below be reversed. Equality before the law does not require just that there be no substantial difference in the physical educational facilities offered by the state. Negro schools housed in a new building, with qualified teachers and well-balanced curricula still could not be said to be equal to similar schools for whites if each Negro school was deliberately, and by specific authority of the State, placed next door to a boiler factory so as to impair substantially the ability of the pupils to hear, and hence to learn. Yet it is an analogous impairment that the court below has here found. It has found that the ability of pupils in the Negro schools to obtain the education offered to them is substantially impaired by the very fact of segregation. This impairment is the result of a deliberate policy specifically authorized by the state. If this be so, we do not understand how it can sensibly be argued that the Negro pupils are being afforded "the equal protection of the laws."

II

THE COURT SHOULD HOLD THAT ENFORCED SEGREGATION IS ILLEGAL PER SE.

This Court, in the Sweatt and McLaurin cases, refused to announce any broad principles concerning the validity of state-enforced segregation per se. It limited its conclusions to the specific cases of inequality which were before it.

It seems to us, however, that there are cogent arguments against such an approach. If the question of the validity of compulsory racial segregation were a new question, there is no doubt that the Court properly should hesitate to announce broad doctrine in this field. But the prior actions of the Court may have placed a larger responsibility upon it. In Plessy v. Ferguson, the Court decided broadly that compulsory racial segregation did not violate the 14th Amendment. With this broad pronunciamento on the record, it may very well be argued that the Court now has a responsibility, if not to reverse the Plessy case, at least to indicate some doubt as to the continued validity of its doctrine. By failing to do so, the Court is in effect telling the states that, absent any finding of inequality, the compulsory segregation of the races is constitutionally permissible. Whether the Court likes it or not, its continued silence on this broad question is taken by many, including the court below, to represent a positive statement that the doctrine of Plessy v. Ferguson, except as specifically modified, remains the law.

Even if we accept the Court's refusal to reach the broad issue of Plessy v. Ferguson, however, it may not be amiss to consider certain broader questions. To take one step at a time is not to deny the usefulness of looking forward to where you are going. Such broadeer considerations, of course, need not be stated by the Court. But they are nevertheless relevant in the Court's decision as to whether it will take the immediate step before it.

Three considerations seem to us worthy of discussion. The first is the general question of the doctrine of Plessy v. Ferguson and the arguments which we believe have been erroneously addressed to the holding of that case. The second is the extent to which the compulsory nature of primary school education should be regarded as differentiating it from the cases of higher education already decided by the courts. Finally, we think that a word should be said concerning the "racial friction and tension"[1] which have been relied upon by some courts to justify their refusal to determine whether segregated education is, in fact, equal education.

1. Compulsory intermingling is not the only alternative to compulsory segregation. Much of the argument relating to the basic question of the validity of racial segregation under the 14th Amendment has, we believe, missed the point. For example, in the Briggs case, No. 101, this Term, it seems to have been assumed by the defendants that the only alternative to compulsory segregation is compulsory intermingling of the races. Testimony was offered by the defendants in that case to the effect that separation of the races in the public schools would occur even "if this issue should be settled on a voluntary basis" because if Negroes were given a choice as to whether to attend Negro schools or schools which were predominantly white, they would prefer to attend schools of their own race.[2]

---

[1] Briggs v. Elliott, No. 101, this Term, R. 180.

[2] "Q. Do you know what the Negro's reaction would be to mixed schools?

. . . .

A. I could not predict what they would do but I have an opinion that is based upon what a number of Negro school administrators have said to me, that if this issue should be settled on a voluntary basis that you would have a continuance of substantially the same situation.

A good many Negroes, Negro school administrators have said that if they remain free to choose the schools to which they would go, they would prefer to have schools of their own race."

—Briggs v. Elliott, No. 101, this Term, R. 116–117

Argument based upon such testimony seems to us to miss the very point at issue. The essence of the whole segregation controversy lies in the distinction between a provision of law permitting individuals to separate themselves according to race and a provision requiring them so to separate. As we pointed out in the Sweatt and McLaurin cases, it is this important distinction which the Court itself ignored in Plessy v. Ferguson. A law permitting individuals to separate themselves according to race permits individuals to exercise their own freedom of choice, to respond in whatever way their prejudices or lack of prejudices may impel them. To require individuals so to separate permits no such choice. Prejudice is imposed by the constituted authority of the state without regard to the preferences of the individual. Yet this Court in the Plessy case treated the two together and assumed that they were the same. Thus the Court said that "we cannot say that a law which authorizes or even requires the separation of the two races in public conveyance" is violative of the 14th Amendment. 163 U.S. at 550. And the argument against the statute, the Court said, "assumes that social prejudices may be overcome by legislation, and that equal rights cannot be secured to the Negro except by an enforced commingling of the two races." 163 U.S. at 551.

The argument, of course, need make no such assumption. The alternatives are not enforced segregation or enforced commingling. Nor is the question whether a law may constitutionally permit the separation of the races. The alternative to enforced segregation is freedom of choice and the question is whether a state may deny that freedom to individuals and require them, willy-nilly, to separate according to race.

The Court could confuse the issue, as it did in the Plessy case, only because it implicitly assumed throughout the opinion that the Negro race was "inferior" [*] and that, given freedom of choice, all whites would refuse to associate with Negroes. On that assumption, and only on that assumption, the only alternatives were segregation and compulsory intermingling,

---

[*] "If one race be inferior to the other socially," the Court said, "the Constitution of the United States cannot put them upon the same plane." 163 U.S. at 551.

BLEED THROUGH

and permissive separation was the same thing as compulsory separation.

The assumption is false. The Congress of Industrial Organizations is living proof that it is false. And, apart from matters of proof, certainly such an assumption, embodying itself the very prejudices at which the 14th Amendment was aimed, has no place in our constitutional doctrine.

2. There are objections to segregation which are particularly applicable to the public schools. These general concepts —that permissive separation is not the same as compulsory segregation and that the constitutional evil in all these cases is not the separation of the races but the denial to the individual of his right to choose to be separate or not—may, perhaps, be usefully applied in dealing with the particular kind of segregation problem here presented, viz: public school education.

Public school education is different from the graduate and legal education situations with which the Court dealt in the Sweatt and McLaurin cases. To pretend otherwise is foolish. But the only difference is not the mores of the community. There are other differences, and these differences weigh particularly against segregation in the public schools.

One such difference is the fact that public education is usually compulsory, while legal and graduate education is not. The state does compel children to go to school. And since it does, it may be argued that a different rule should apply to public school education than applies to other forms of education which the state offers on a voluntary basis. Cf. Hamilton v. University of California, 293 U.S. 245.

Compulsory segregation coupled with compulsory attendance is particularly objectionable. There is nothing which requires a state to compel attendance by each pupil at a specific school. In many communities it is customary to permit individual students, or their parents, to exercise a choice concerning the particular school which they will attend. That, in fact, is the pattern in the Topeka case now before the Court (R. 245). The fact that the state compels children to go to school, in other words, need not necessarily mean that it must deny to them a choice of schools. It is possible, in the words of the testimony in the Briggs case, that this matter can "be settled on a voluntary basis." The appellants do not here complain that the state should compel Negroes to attend white schools. They complain only that it forbids those Negroes who want to attend the white schools from doing so. It may very well be true that most Negroes, if given a choice, will continue to attend schools which are predominantly attended by Negroes and that very few would choose to attend the predominantly white schools. But this lends no support whatsoever to the action of the state in denying to the Negroes the opportunity so to choose.

We do not mean, be it understood, that there is anything in the 14th Amendment which makes it mandatory that pupils be given a choice of school. We only mean that the elimination of compulsory segregation is not the same thing as compulsory attendance of whites at Negro schools, or Negroes at white schools, because the states can, wherever they now compel separation, offer separation on a voluntary basis. Even compulsory attendance at particular schools based on residential districting rests ultimately on the voluntary choice of residence. Negroes and whites would no more be compelled to attend the same schools under such regulations than were Negroes and whites compelled to live in the same neighborhood when compulsory residential segregation was declared invalid in Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U.S. 60.

If it eventually declares that the States are forbidden to enforce their constitutional and statutory declarations that no Negro shall ever be taught in the same public school as white, the Court will, it is true, necessarily limit the freedom of choice of some. Since public education is assumed to be compulsory and since it is possible that some Negroes will exercise the choice, if it is given to them, of attending the "white schools," it may very well be that some white children will be forced to attend schools in which there are some Negroes in attendance. That is the true measure, we submit, of the "compulsion" which would be involved in the invalidation of segregation in the public schools.' Surely the Constitution does not recognize the right of the prejudiced to be free from the sight of those against whom they are prejudiced, or justify the imposition of restraints upon one segment of the community in order to satisfy the desire of some that there be such restraints.

Another difference between segregation in the public schools and segregation in the graduate schools is that the former affects the students at a younger and therefore more impressionable age. Students are not only unable to avoid segregation in the public schools, as by not attending, but are more adversely affected by it because they are younger. The testimony of sociologists is uniform as to the deleterious effects of segregation on Negro children, and in a different way, on white, and the younger the children the more these effects are accentuated.

3. Threatened resentment by some whites is no basis for denying to Negroes the equal protection of the laws. The District Court in this case made a finding of fact, based on evidence submitted to it, that the very fact of segregation reduced the educational opportunity of children required by the state to attend Negro schools. Similar evidence was offered in the South Carolina case, Briggs v. Elliott, No. 101. The Court there, however, refused to consider such evidence. It said that this question is not a question of constitutional right but of legislative policy, "which must be formulated not in vacuo or with doctrinaire disregard of existing conditions but in a realistic approach to the situations to which it is to be applied" (R. 180). The issue as to the effect of segregation upon educational opportunity, raised by the plaintiffs, it said, was on the same footing as the issue of "racial friction and tension" which was raised by the defendant. Neither question, it believed, should properly be resolved by the courts; both considerations were appropriate matters only for legislative judgment.

The essential error in this approach is that it reserves for

'If the defendants in the Briggs case are right in their contention that Negroes will prefer Negro schools, the "compulsion" will be zero—since there will be no Negro students in the white schools. The extent to which they are wrong is exactly the extent of the discrimination which is practiced against the Negroes under a segregated system.

legislative judgment by the states the balancing of rights protected by the Constitution, on the one hand, against other objectives presumably desired by the state, on the other. It is no answer to a claim that segregation creates inequality, and hence violates a constitutionally protected right, to say that the state, as a matter of legislative judgment, regards other considerations as more important.

There is no claim here that the elimination of segregation, and of the inequality which is created thereby, in the public schools would do more than create a "violent emotional reaction" in the communities (R. 114). There is no claim that there would be any immediate danger of open disturbances of the public peace. But even if there were such claims, they would be irrelevant. The Constitution does not say that all persons shall be given the equal protection of the laws insofar as it is convenient to do so. As this Court said in Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U.S. 60, in answer to an argument that segregation would promote the public peace by preventing race conflicts:

> "Desirable as this is, and important as is the preservation of the public peace, this aim cannot be accomplished by laws or ordinances which deny rights created or protected by the federal Constitution."

Prediction is hazardous. Insofar, however, as the actual history of the integration of educational facilities in the past can shed light on the effect of a decision enjoining segregation today, it leads to the conclusion that the vague threats of grave unrest which are always relied upon in these cases to justify the continued denial of equality of rights have as much substance, and no more, than the claims made in Buchanan v. Warley, thirty-five years ago, that an injunction against compulsory residential segregation would lead to vast racial conflagrations.

Certainly the experience of the Congress of Industrial Organizations supports the view that the dire consequences which are so often predicted are merely phantoms. The CIO, through its Southern Organizing Committee, is proving daily that the myth of incompatability between white and Negro is but a myth. There are frictions and tensions, to be sure. But they are not nearly of the magnitude usualiy pictured. We have proved that it is possible for free men, white and Negro, to associate themselves together voluntarily without conflict, in the absence of compulsion by the state.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated we respectfully urge that the judgment of the court below should be reversed.

Interest of the Amici

This brief is filed, with the consent of both parties, on behalf of the American Civil Liberties Union, the American Ethical Union, American Jewish Committee, the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, the Japanese American Citizens League and the Unitarian Fellowship for Social Justice. The Appendix contains a description of each of these organizations.

The present case and the companion cases, all involving the constitutionality of racial segregation in public elementary and secondary schools, present an issue with which all six organizations are deeply concerned because such segregation deprives millions of persons of rights that are freely enjoyed by others and adversely affects the entire democratic structure of our society.

We have read the briefs of the appellants, with the appendix thereto, and we unequivocally endorse the arguments, legal, educational and sociological, therein advanced. In this amici brief we are urging arguments which have not been made in the appellants' briefs and which we believe should be presented to this Court.

Statement of the Case

The adult appellants are Negro citizens of the United States and of the State of Kansas (R. 3-4) while the infant appellants are their children eligible to attend and now attending elementary schools in Topeka, Kansas, a city of the first class within the meaning of Section 13-101, General Statutes of Kansas, 1949. Appellees are State officers empowered by State law to maintain and operate the public schools of Topeka, Kansas.

On March 22, 1951, appellants instituted this action seeking a declaratory judgment and an injunction to compel the State to admit Negro children to the elementary public schools of Topeka on an unsegregated basis on the ground that segregation deprived them of equal educational opportunities within the meaning of the Fourteenth Amendment (R. 2-7). In their answer, appellees admitted that they acted pursuant to the statute, that infant appellants were not eligible to attend any of the eighteen "white" elementary schools solely because of their race and color (R. 12, 24), but that they were eligible to attend the equivalent public schools maintained for Negro children in the City of Topeka (R. 11, 12). The Attorney General of the State of Kansas filed a separate answer defending the validity of the statute in question (R. 14).

The court below was convened in accordance with Title 28, United States Code, §2284 and on June 25-26 a trial on the merits took place (R. 63 et seq.). On August 3, 1951, the court below filed its opinion, 98 F. Supp. 797 (R. 238-244), its findings of fact (R. 244-246), and conclusions of law (R. 246-247), and entered a final judgment and decree in appellees' favor denying the relief sought (R. 247).

Appellants filed a petition for appeal on October 1, 1951 (R. 248), and an order allowing the appeal was duly entered (R. 250). Probable jurisdiction was noted on June 9, 1952 (R. 254). Jurisdiction of this Court rests on Title 28, United States Code, §§1253 and 2201 (b).

The Statute Involved

Segregated elementary schools in Topeka, Kansas, are maintained solely pursuant to the authority of Section 72-1724 of the General Statutes of Kansas (1949) which reads as follows:

> Powers of board; separate schools for white and colored children; manual training. The board of education shall have power to elect their own officers, make all necessary rules for the government of the schools of such city under its charge and control and of the board, subject to the provisions of this act and the laws of this state; to organize and maintain separate schools for the education of white and colored children, including the high schools in Kansas City, Kans.; no discrimination on account of color shall be made in high schools except as provided herein; to exercise the sole control over the public schools and school property of such city; and shall have the power to establish a high school or high schools in connection with manual training and instruction or otherwise, and to maintain the same as a part of the public-school system of said city. (G. S. 1868, Ch. 18, §75; L. 1879, Ch. 81, §1; L. 1905, Ch. 414, §1; Feb. 28; R. S. 1923, §72-1724.)

The Question Presented

The question presented by this appeal is whether the State of Kansas, or indeed any State, by establishing racial segregation in its public elementary school system, has violated the equal protection of the laws clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution.

BLEED THROUGH

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

This Court has never ruled directly on the constitutionality of racial segregation in public elementary schools. Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537 (1896) and Gong Lum v. Rice, 275 U. S. 78 (1927), relied upon by the court below, are not controlling here.

Segregation in State-supported educational institutions violates the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment in that it is an inadmissible classification. This Court has consistently rejected differential treatment by State authority predicated upon racial classifications or distinctions.

The finding of the lower court that Negro children are disadvantaged by the segregated public school system necessitates granting the relief requested. That which is unequal in fact cannot be equal in law and, therefore, segregation and equality cannot co-exist in public education.

POINT I

The validity under the equal protection of the laws clause of the Fourteenth Amendment of racial segregation in public educational facilities has never been decided by this Court.

The issue now squarely before this Court is whether the State of Kansas, pursuant to statute, may maintain and operate racially segregated public elementary schools, without heed to the damage inflicted by segregation upon its Negro victims. Despite the transcendent importance of the question, this Court has never ruled directly on the constitutionality of racial segregation in public education. The Court has ruled on related problems, such as the validity of racial segregation in transportation and in housing. Regretfully, it has, but always in dictum, appeared to accept racial segregation where the validity of segregation was not actually before the Court. Historically, these dicta reflect the fact that prior to World War I, the status of the American Negro was such that he could make no realistic demand for equality of treatment in those sections of the country in which he lived in substantial numbers. Because of his depressed economic condition and concentration in agriculture, his children could not even obtain the most elementary education. Myrdal, An American Dilemma, Ch. 8-9 (1944).

Following the adoption in 1868 of the Fourteenth Amendment, the earliest case in which some reference was made by this Court to racial segregation in education was Hall v. DeCuir, 95 U. S. 485 (1878). That case involved the validity of a State statute prohibiting segregation in public carriers. The statute was declared unconstitutional as an improper regulation of foreign and interstate commerce. In a concurring opinion, Mr. Justice Clifford reviewed with approval the conclusions of a number of State cases which had upheld the reasonableness of racial segregation in education and stated in dictum that segregation in the public schools did not violate the Fourteenth Amendment if physically equal facilities for Negroes were provided. It is probably unnecessary for us to note that no evidence was offered in that case, because it would have been irrelevant, that school segregation must in fact involve inequality.

In 1896 this Court decided Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537 (1896), which sustained the constitutionality of a Louisiana statute requiring public carriers to furnish separate but equal coach accommodations for whites and Negroes. The Court as before, in dictum, cited with approval several old State cases which had held that a State could require the segregation of racial groups in its educational system.

The constitutionality of "separate but equal" facilities in education was concededly not before the Court in either the Hall or the Plessy cases. Yet, although there was no evidentiary or psycho-sociological basis for a discussion of equal facilities in education, and in spite of the fact that the statements of the Court were clearly dicta, the Plessy case has been cited to this date by State and lower Federal courts to sustain the constitutionality of segregation in public educational institutions. See cases cited, 46 Mich. L. Rev. 639, 643 (1948).

Three years later, this Court decided Cumming v. County Board of Education, 175 U. S. 528 (1899). There an injunction was sought to restrain a board of education in Georgia from maintaining a high school for white children where none was maintained for Negro children. The State court had upheld the board, saying that its allocation of funds did not involve bad faith or abuse of discretion. In affirming the decision of the State court, this Court speaking through Mr. Justice Harlan, the lone dissenter in Plessy, stated expressly that racial segregation in the school system was not in issue. (542, 546)

The next case before this Court which involved compulsory educational segregation was Berea College v. Kentucky, 211 U. S. 45 (1908), wherein the validity of a State statute which prohibited domestic corporations from teaching white and Negro pupils in the same private educational institution was attacked. While the scope of the statute was broad enough to include individuals as well as corporations, this Court said:

> . . . it is unnecessary for us to consider anything more than the question of its validity as applied to corporations. . . . Even if it were conceded that its assertions of power over individuals cannot be sustained, still it must be upheld so far as it restrains corporations. (54)

This Court agreed with the reasoning of the State court that the statute could be upheld as coming within the power of a State over one of its own corporate creatures. The statute was not deemed to have worked a deprivation of property rights. The rights of individuals were not considered.[1]

---

[1] Interestingly, since the decisions of this Court in Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629 (1950) and in McLaurin v. Oklahoma, 339 U. S. 637 (1950), Berea College accepts Negro students.

BLEED THROUGH

Not until 1927 did racial classification in educational institutions again become the subject of controversy before this Court. In Gong Lum v. Rice, 275 U. S. 78 (1927), a Chinese girl contested the right of the State of Mississippi to assign her to a Negro school under the State's segregated school system. Mississippi contended that under its statute requiring separate schools to be maintained for children of the white and colored races, the plaintiff could not insist on being classed with the whites and that the legislature was not compelled to provide separate schools for each of the non-white races.

The issue of segregation was not presented in that case. The plaintiff accepted the system of segregation in the public schools of the State but contested her classification within that system.

Nor was the validity of segregation before the Court in the case of Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, 305 U. S. 337 (1938). There the petitioner was refused admission to the University of Missouri Law School, a State-supported institution, solely because he was a Negro. He brought mandamus to compel the University to admit him. The State, having no law school for Negroes, sought to fulfill its obligation to provide equal educational facilities by offering to pay the petitioner's tuition for a legal education in another State. This the Court held did not satisfy the constitutional requirement. It said that the petitioner was entitled to be admitted to the University of Missouri Law School in the absence of other and proper provision for his legal training within the State of Missouri. The issue was whether an otherwise qualified Negro applicant for law training could be excluded from the only State-supported law school. This Court assumed that the validity of equal facilities in racially separate schools was settled by earlier decisions and cited the Plessy case, McCabe v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co., 235 U. S. 151 (1914), both of which involved segregation in public carriers, and the Gong Lum case. But the constitutional validity of segregation was not decided.

The next consideration of a related problem was in 1948 in Sipuel v. Board of Regents of the University of Oklahoma, 332 U. S. 631. This Court, in a per curiam decision, said that the State must provide law school facilities for the Negro petitioner "in conformity with the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and provide it as soon as it does for applicants of any other group" (633). The facts in the Sipuel case were similar to those in the Gaines case, in that no law school facilities were afforded Negroes by the State of Oklahoma.

Segregation was not at issue in the Sipuel case. This Court stated in Fisher v. Hurst, 333 U. S. 147 (1948), that:

> The petition for certiorari in Sipuel v. University of Oklahoma did not present the issue whether a state might not satisfy the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment by establishing a separate law school for Negroes. On submission, we were clear it was not an issue here. (150)

The most recent cases involving segregation in public institutions of learning were Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629 (1950) and McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Board of Regents, 339 U. S. 637 (1950). Although the petitioners and numerous amici in those cases urged this Court to rule expressly that discrimination inevitably results from enforced segregation in educational institutions, the Court did not reach that question. In Sweatt, Mr. Chief Justice Vinson, speaking for a unanimous Court, said, "Nor need we reach petitioner's contention that Plessy v. Ferguson should be reexamined in the light of contemporary knowledge respecting the purposes of the Fourteenth Amendment and the effects of racial segregation" (636). The judgment of the court below was reversed and the University of Texas Law School was ordered to admit the petitioner because equivalent educational opportunity was not afforded by the hastily organized Negro law school.

In McLaurin, again speaking for a unanimous bench, Mr. Chief Justice Vinson expressly limited the decision:

> In this case, we are faced with the question whether a state may, after admitting a student to graduate instruction in its state university, afford him different treatment from other students solely because of his race. We decide only this issue . . . (638)

Thus in no case previously before this Court, in which racial segregation in public education has been the subject of comment in an opinion, has the Court felt called upon to rule squarely on the issue: Does segregation in public educational institutions meet the requirements of the equal protection of the laws clause of the Fourteenth Amendment?

We emphasize that absence of a specific ruling at the outset of this brief because of the thread of urgency running through the fabric of much previous argument on the crucial issue in this case, namely, that the "separate but equal" doctrine, as it has been thought to apply to public educational institutions, should be "overruled". Indeed, in that framework, there is nothing to overrule. But there are dicta which must be disavowed. The constitutionality of segregation in educational institutions was clearly not involved in Plessy or Gong Lum, the two cases relied upon by the court below.

POINT II

Racial segregation in public educational institutions is an unconstitutional classification under the equal protection of the laws clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

This Court's decisions in cases involving the constitutionality of governmental action reveal a special scrutiny and constant vigilance in those instances where such action was predicated upon alleged racial distinctions or where racial classifications were involved. Except in times of overriding peril or crisis, this Court has rejected all obvious or devious efforts to establish racial or religious lines of demarcation for the enjoyment of civil rights.

Whereas in cases involving other types of legislative classifications, the "one who assails the classification . . . must carry the burden of showing that it does not rest upon any reasonable basis", Lindsley v. Natural Carbonic Gas Co., 220 U. S. 61, 79 (1911), "all legal restrictions which curtail the civil rights of a single racial group are immediately suspect". Korematsu v. U. S., 323 U. S. 214, 216 (1944).

Again, "only the most exceptional circumstances can excuse discrimination on that basis in the face of the equal protection clause." Oyama v. California, 332 U. S. 633, 646 (1948). In Hirabayashi v. U. S., 320 U. S. 81 (1943), this Court said:

> Distinctions between citizens solely because of their ancestry are by their very nature odious to a free people whose institutions are founded upon the doc> trine of equality. For that reason, legislative classification or discrimination based on race alone has often been held to be a denial of equal protection. (100)

BLEED THROUGH

In the application of these principles, the Court has, with one exception (discussed infra), always declared governmental classification based on race or color to be constitutionally invalid.

This Court has ruled that Negroes must be treated the same as whites with respect to the privilege and duty of jury service. Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U. S. 303 (1880). It has stricken down state statutes aimed at keeping the Negro "in his place." Bailey v. Alabama, 219 U. S. 219 (1911); U. S. v. Reynolds, 235 U. S. 133 (1914). Common carriers engaged in interstate travel have been prevented from segregating and discriminating on the basis of race or color. Mitchell v. U. S., 313 U. S. 80 (1941); Morgan v. Virginia, 328 U. S. 373 (1946); Henderson v. U. S., 339 U. S. 816 (1950). Repeated instances of prejudice in criminal cases evidenced by brutal treatment of Negroes have been condemned. Brown v. Mississippi, 297 U. S. 278 (1936); Chambers v. Florida, 309 U. S. 227 (1940); Shepherd v. Florida, 341 U. S. 50 (1951). Racial segregation through zoning and attempts to institutionalize ghettos by restrictive covenants have been outlawed. Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U. S. 60 (1917); Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U. S. 1 (1948). Discrimination has been forbidden in labor unions that receive their collective bargaining and representation powers by virtue of statute. Steele v. Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co., 323 U. S. 192 (1944); Tunstall v. Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, 323 U. S. 210 (1944); Brotherhood of R. R. Trainmen v. Howard, — U. S. —, 72 S. Ct. 1022 (1952).

From time to time, this Court has stricken down all the various devices used to prevent or limit Negroes from participating in elections. Guinn v. U. S., 238 U. S. 347 (1915); Nixon v. Herndon, 273 U. S. 536 (1927); Smith v. Allwright, 321 U. S. 649 (1944). So, too, laws which in their administration have effected a limitation or denial of the right to carry on a business or calling because of race or ancestry, have been declared unconstitutional. Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356 (1886); Yu Cong Eng v. Trinidad, 271 U. S. 500 (1926); Takahashi v. Fish and Game Commission, 334 U. S. 410 (1948).

In Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U. S. 60, which involved a racial residential zoning ordinance, the State invoked its authority to pass laws in the exercise of its police power, and urged that this compulsory separation of the races in habitation be sustained because it would "promote the public peace by preventing race conflicts" (81). This Court rejected that contention, saying:

> The authority of the state to pass laws in the exercise of the police power . . . is very broad . . . [and] the exercise of this power is not to be interfered with by the courts where it is within the scope of legislative authority and the means adopted reasonably tend to accomplish a lawful purpose. But it is equally well established that the police power . . . cannot justify the passage of a law or ordinance which runs counter to the limitations of the Federal Constitution . . . (74).

The police power of the State, broad as it is, does not justify a racial classification where rights created or protected by the Constitution are involved.

In Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U. S. 1, this Court, by unanimous decision, held that the enforcement of racial restrictive covenants by State courts is State action, prohibited by the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. In the course of its decision, the Court measurably strengthened the equal protection clause as a formidable barrier to restrictions having the effect of racial segregation. The contention was there pressed that since the State courts stand ready to enforce racial covenants excluding white persons from occupancy or ownership, enforcement of covenants excluding Negroes is not a denial of equal protection. This Court rejected the equality of application argument, decisively dismissing it in the following language:

BLEED THROUGH

> This contention does not bear scruitiny. . . . The rights created by the first section of the Fourteenth Amendment are, by its terms, guaranteed to the individual. The rights established are personal rights. It is, therefore, no answer to these petitioners to say that the courts may also be induced to deny white persons rights of ownership and occupancy on grounds of race or color. Equal protection of the laws is not achieved through indiscriminate imposition of inequalities. (21, 22)

There has been but one recent departure from this rule. This Court stated that "in the crisis of war and of threatened invasion" when the national safety might appear to be imperilled, it will permit a racial classification by the Federal Government. Hirabayashi v. U. S., 320 U. S. 81, 101. That case involved a prosecution for failure to obey a curfew order directed against citizens of Japanese ancestry. Korematsu v. U. S., 323 U. S. 214, arising out of the same war emergency, involved the validity of a governmental order excluding all persons of Japanese ancestry from the West Coast military area. The Court, on the grounds of overriding pressing public urgency in time of war, sustained the racial classification in these cases, but it emphasized that this was an extraordinary exception. "[L]egislative classification or discrimination based on race alone has often been held to be a denial of equal protection. . . . We may assume", continued the Court, "that these considerations would be controlling here were it not for the fact that the danger of espionage and sabotage, in time of war and of threatened invasion" has made necessary this racial classification, which "is not to be condemned merely because in other and in most circumstances racial distinctions are irrelevant." Hirabayashi v. U. S., supra, 101.

Clearly, State laws providing for racial segregation in public educational facilities are not accompanied by any "pressing public necessity". The record here is barren of any such showing, as indeed it would have to be. Rather, there is a pressing public necessity to give all American citizens their due—equality of opportunity to use educational facilities established by the State for its inhabitants.

POINT III

The finding of the court below, that Negro children are disadvantaged by the segregated public school system of Topeka, requires this Court to disavow the "separate but equal" doctrine as it has been applied to public educational institutions.

In one vital respect, the problem posed by this record is sharpened to the point of unique narrowness. The unchallenged finding that segregation irreparably damages the child lifts this case out of the murky realm of speculation on the issue of "equality" of facilities, into the area of certainty that segregation and equality cannot co-exist. That which is unequal in fact cannot be equal in law.

It is respectfully submitted that the finding of the court below, that Negro children were disadvantaged by the segregation of white and colored students in the public elementary schools, requires this Court to reverse the lower court's refusal to grant the requested relief. The lower court found as a fact that the segregation of white and Negro children in the public schools "has a detrimental effect upon the colored children"; that such segregation creates in Negro children a "sense of inferiority" which "affects the motivation of a child to learn"; that legally sanctioned segregation "therefore has a tendency to retard the educational and mental development of [N]egro children and to deprive them of some of the benefits they would receive in a racially integrated school system."

Educators and social scientists have long proclaimed that these and other social evils necessarily flow from racially segregated education. Segregation in Public Schools—A Violation of "Equal Protection of the Laws", 56 Yale L. J. 1059, 1061 (1947). See also Long, Some Psychogenic Hazards of Segregated Education of Negroes, 4 J. of Negro Ed. 336, 343 (1935); Long, *The Intelligence of Colored Elementary Pupils in Washington, D. 61 (1937); Myrdal, An American Dilemma, 54-5, 97-101, 577-8, 758; Frenkel-Brunswik, A Study of Prejudice in Children, 1 Human Relations 295, 305 (1948); Goodman, Race Awareness in Young Children (1952); Adorno, Frenkel-Brunswik, Levinson and Sanford, The Authoritarian Personality, Ch. IV, V (1950).

Whenever this Court has been presented with a record that established inequality in fact as between educational opportunities offered by the State to its white and Negro inhabitants, it has ordered the immediate termination of the inequality. Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, 305 U. S. 337; Sipuel v. Board of Regents, 332 U. S. 631; Fisher v. Hurst, 333 U. S. 147; Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629. In McLaurin v. Oklahoma, 339 U. S. 637, this Court went even further to hold that officially imposed racial segregation within a State-maintained school violated the equal protection clause. It is noteworthy that the court below said in its opinion, where "segregation within a school as in the McLaurin case is a denial of due process, it is difficult to see why segregation in separate schools would not result in the same denial." Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, 98 F. Supp. 797, 800 (Emphasis added).

We respectfully urge this Court to follow the principles it recently enunciated in Sweatt and McLaurin, rather than the unsound ones of Plessy and Gong Lum, and to hold unequivocally that racial segregation per se in all State educational institutions, is a violation of the equal protection of the laws clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The Need to Disavow Plessy

As we explained in Point I, we believe that Plessy is not controlling. Assuming, arguendo, that the court below was justified by Plessy in refusing to hold that segregation in public elementary schools is per se discrimination under the Fourteenth Amendment, this Court should now expressly overrule Plessy and reverse the court below. This Court has not hesitated in the past to overrule or reconsider and reverse earlier decisions where the nature and consequences of discrimination became fully disclosed or apparent upon later consideration. Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U. S. 105 (1943), reversing Jones v. Opelika, 316 U. S. 584 (1942); West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U. S. 624 (1943), overruling Minersville School District v. Gobitis, 310 U. S. 586 (1940); Smith v. Allwright, 321 U. S. 649, overruling Grovey v. Townsend, 295 U. S. 45 (1935). "In constitutional questions, where correction depends upon amendment and not upon legislative action this Court through its history has freely exercised its power to reexamine the basis of its constitutional decisions." Smith v. Allwright, supra, 655 and cases cited in footnote 10 thereto.

BLEED THROUGH

Lower courts, State and federal, have indicated clearly that they believe a break with the "separate but equal" doctrine in education is "in the wind", but they insist that they must await such a holding by this Court. Belton v. Gebhart, decided by the Delaware Court of Chancery, April 1, 1952, affirmed by the Supreme Court of that State on August 28, 1952; Banks v. San Francisco Housing Authority, decided October 1, 1952, by the Superior Court of San Francisco; Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, 98 F. Supp. 797, 798; Briggs v. Elliott, 98 F. Supp. 529, 535 (1951).

It is not surprising that American courts are questioning the validity of Plessy in view of the tremendous changes which have taken place since the turn of the century in the understanding of the nature of the individual and his relationships to racial groupings and to society. Scientific research in the fields of anthropology, sociology, biology and education has demonstrated the fallaciousness of the racial and blood strain concepts which are basic to the majority opinion in Plessy.

Peaceful Integration Will Follow

The defenders of racial segregation have frequently expressed the fear that compulsory destruction of the barriers in the public schools would increase racial tensions and even cause strife. Such results, obviously, should be avoided if possible, without yielding constitutional principles. Experience, however, has clearly demonstrated that these dire predictions are unfounded.

Following this Court's decision in McLaurin v. Oklahoma, 339 U. S. 637, Negro students applied for admission and were admitted in large numbers to that State's colleges and universities. By June 1951, approximately 400 Negroes were enrolled at the University of Oklahoma and at Oklahoma A & M, all without the slightest increase in racial tension, but rather with every sign of increased mutual understanding and respect. The Oklahoma City Daily Oklahoman, June 7, 1951.

In Texas, after the decision in Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629, two Negroes were admitted to the University of Texas Law School and two others were admitted to the Dental School. 52 American Jewish Yearbook 42 (1951); The Houston Chronicle, Sept. 10, 1952. Negroes have also been admitted to private institutions of higher learning in Texas following Sweatt. Southern Methodist University (The Houston Post, January 9, 1951), Amarillo College (Dallas Times Herald, October 2, 1951) and several other junior colleges (The Houston Informer, December 5, 1951) have all found that the admission of Negroes was possible without any adverse effect upon interracial relations. Quite the contrary. The Austin Statesman of November 14, 1950, reported the white students at Southern Methodist University advised the president that "SMU student opinion favors admitting Negroes to the school."

The University of Arkansas has accepted Negroes for LL.B. and M.D. degrees. Little Rock Arkansas Gazette, July 1, 1951; New York Post, August 24, 1948. Notwithstanding the fact that the University of Florida has thus far refused to admit Negroes, the Florida Student Government Association, an organization of student leaders representing all colleges and universities in the State, unanimously passed a resolution calling for an immediate end to racial segregation in the State's institutions of higher learning. Miami Herald, May 6, 1951. The University of Kentucky since 1949 has enrolled Negro students. New York Herald Tribune, June 23, 1949. By July 1950, twelve Negroes were attending classes at the University and "[t]hey took their places quietly in the student body without any open hostility." Dawkins, Kentucky Outgrows Segregation, The Survey, July 1950. Private educational institutions have followed the lead of the University of Kentucky. Berea College led the way. Three Roman Catholic colleges in Louisville, Nazareth, Ursuline and Bellarmine Colleges, immediately followed suit. Next to fall in line was the University of Louisville with a student body of seven thousand. Southern Baptist Theological Seminary and Louisville Theological Seminary now also admit Negroes on an unsegregated basis.

In July 1950, the first Negroes were admitted to the University of Missouri and less than two years later a Negro was appointed to the faculty. St. Louis Post-

Dispatch, July 7, 1950; St. Louis Globe-Democrat, April 17, 1952. St. Louis University has admitted Negroes to all its facilities for the past few years. They have been fully integrated into the University program with no unhappy results. During the academic year 1950-51, a total of 351 Negro students was enrolled and there were five Negro faculty members. The experience of institutions like St. Louis University has demonstrated that the admission of Negro students poses no problem of acceptance by white students. Morisey, A New Trend in Private Colleges, New South, Aug.-Sept. 1951. Another private university in St. Louis, Washington University, admits Negroes to all its branches and schools. St. Louis Post-Dispatch, May 11, 1952. Its experience has been identical with that of St. Louis University.

In July 1951, the University of North Carolina admitted its first Negro student. Washington Times-Herald, July 17, 1951. The following September, six additional Negro students attending the University, were excluded from the regular student cheering section at a football game. When the entire student body protested this action by the University authorities, it was quickly reversed. New York Herald Tribune, September 28, 1951.

Since 1951, the University of Virginia has been admitting Negro students and "the formerly 'all-white' schools which have accepted Negro students have found that their presence creates no special problem". Richmond News Leader, September 25, 1952.

The College of William and Mary, which next to Harvard University is the oldest of the country's colleges, has admitted two Negro students, both of whom are attending regular day classes. According to President

BLEED THROUGH

Chandler, "[t]he presence of these two Negro graduate students has not created any special problems on the campus." Ibid.

By July 1951, there were approximately one thousand Negro students in previously "all-white" institutions of higher education in the South. "They have encountered virtually no open objection to their presence." Saveth, The Supreme Court and Segregation, The Survey, July 1951.

Just as the admission of Negroes to formerly "all-white" colleges and universities has created no friction or other difficulties, so too experience has proved that integration of white and Negro children at the elementary and high school levels can be acieved without incident.

In the State of New Mexico where segregation is allowed, though not required, in the public schools, the town of Carlsbad maintained separate schools for the two races until 1951. Following the refusal of the State School Board to accredit the inferior Negro high school, the local school authorities voted to admit Negroes to the "white" school. "Carlsbad white students approved the move. The 1951 graduating class and the high school senior council voted unanimously to welcome the Negro students. The junior and senior class and faculty members were 95 per cent in favor of it." Santa Fe New Mexican, September 2, 1951. The integration has not caused a single untoward incident to date. Furthermore, racial segregation was abolished in Alamagordo's public schools in August of this year and the first Negro teacher was hired to teach in that New Mexico city's integrated public schools. There has been no disharmony as a result of either action.

Racial segregation in public schools is not required in Arizona. Local school boards are free to determine whether or not they will maintain a dual educational system. Under this local option provision, segregation has been abandoned in the public schools of every city and town in the State except Phoenix. The transition from segregation to integration was made in all these communities without any difficulty.

Despite the fact that segregation in public schools has been banned in Illinois for many years, segregation was the practice in most of the southern counties. A 1949 State statute provided that no State funds should be made available to any school district where racial segregation of students is practiced. This statute led to a movement to abolish segregation in the southern communities of Illinois. Notwithstanding an 85-year-old policy of racial segregation in the public schools of East St. Louis, the local board of education abandoned segregation and adopted a policy of integration. There was "no indication of any organized resistance to the change" which was effected without incident. The New York Times, January 30, 1950. Segregation in public schools was also abandoned in Harrisburg (Chicago Sun-Times, September 26, 1950), in Alton, a stronghold of racial discrimination even during World War II (Pittsburgh Courier, December 1, 1951), and in Cairo at the southernmost tip of the State.

A similar process of uneventful integration is underway in southern Ohio. In Glendale, a town about fifteen miles from the Kentucky border, segregation in the public schools was ended in October of this year when the local board of education was advised that exclusion of Negro pupils from a formerly "all-white" school violated the Constitution. In Dayton, the school board abolished segregation in the use of two swimming pools at Roosevelt High School on June 22, 1950. Dayton Journal Herald, June 23, 1950.

New Jersey is another State which, while normally considered a Northern State, has a long-standing tradition of racial segregation in its southern regions. In November 1947, the people of New Jersey adopted a new State Constitution which prohibited any person from being "segregated in the militia or in the public schools, because of religious principles, race, color, ancestry or national origin". When this Constitution was adopted, cynics remarked that the clause against racial segregation was an excellent statement of principle but they predicted that segregation would not be eliminated for at least a generation. In 1948, the New Jersey Department of Education made a survey of the 52 school districts in the State which were reported to practice segregation in one form or another. It found that in 43 districts, segregation was imposed by the school authorities. These districts ranged in size from rural areas with one-room schools to large cities with many schools. The end of the school year 1950-51 saw the complete elimination of segregation in 39 of the 43 school districts involved. In the other 4 districts, steps had by that time been taken and building proposals were underway which would bring about complete integration in the near future. The report of the New Jersey Department of Education states:

> A most significant factor in this transition is that it has been done with a minimum of friction and a maximum of good will.
> Another important factor has been the success with which colored teachers, who formerly taught classes consisting of all colored children, have been employed to teach classes of mixed races. While many individual examples could be cited, one in particular bears mentioning. The one in question contained the only junior high school operated on a segregated basis. This junior high school was a fairly large institution and naturally existed in a good sized city. Today, the student body of this school is approximately one-third Negro and two-thirds white. The teachers who formerly were teaching all-Negro junior high school classes have been completely integrated into the new setup and include teachers of all regular and special subjects. The morale of both the student body and faculty is excellent. Biennial Report for the Years July 1, 1949, to June 30, 1951, State of New Jersey, Department of Education, Division Against Discrimination 12, 13.

On the basis of the accumulated experience, instances of which we have described above, we are convinced that integration can and will be accomplished in the public schools of the South without "bloodshed and violence" if the law enforcement agencies, federal or local, demonstrate that they will not tolerate breaches of the peace or incitement. Americans are law abiding people and abhor klanism and violence.

Segregation Is An Economic Waste

There is another cogent reason that this Court should speak out clearly and definitively now. Since the "separate but equal" doctrine in public education will have to be abandoned ultimately, it should be abandoned sooner rather than later, to forestall the wasteful expenditure by many States of huge sums of money to build segregated schools when that money could be used more economically and enduringly to build and improve public schools where they will provide the greatest good for the greatest number. This we believe is a necessary consequence of the constitutional requirement that the State must grant each person equal protection of its laws.

BLEED THROUGH

The President's Committee on Civil Rights, in its historic report, To Secure These Rights (1947), states:

> The South is one of the poorer sections of the country and has at best only limited funds to spend on its schools. With 34.5 percent of the country's population, 17 southern states and the District of Columbia have 39.4 percent of our school children. Yet the South has only one-fifth of the taxpaying wealth of the nation. Actually, on a percentage basis, the South spends a greater share of its income on education than do the wealthier states in other parts of the country. (63)

The South has been struggling under a heavy financial burden to support its educational system, with the Negro schools admittedly inferior to the white. The southern States would have to expend over one and one-half billion dollars to bring the Negro schools to the level of the "white" schools and, in addition, approximately eighty-one million dollars annually just to maintain parity. Charles H. Thompson, Dean, Graduate School of Howard University, Letter to the Editor, The New York Times, April 6, 1952. This additional burden is beyond the capacity of the South to bear. Bond, in Education of the Negro in the American Social Order (1934) sums this up:

> If the South had an entirely homogeneous population, it would not be able to maintain schools of high quality for the children unless its states and local communities resorted to heavy, almost crushing rates of taxation. The situation is further complicated by the fact that a dual system is maintained. Considering the expenditures made for Negro schools, it is clear that the plaint frequently made that this dual system is a burden is hardly true; but it is also clear that if an honest attempt were made to maintain "equal, though separate schools", the burden would be impossible even beyond the limitation of existing poverty. (231)

Public schools should be planned and erected as part of the development of the total community. They should be built in those areas that have expanding populations and needs for such facilities, rather than in opportunistic response to random law suits or threats of law suits, as is now the case in many southern States.

Conclusion

The United States is now engaged in an ideological world conflict in which the practices of our democracy are the subject of close scrutiny abroad. We cannot afford, nor will the world permit us, to rest upon democratic pretensions unrelated to reality.

The people of other lands listen not only to our Voice of America which quite properly extols the virtues of democracy; they listen to broadcasts from Communist sources as well. We know that our enemies seize eagerly upon the weaknesses of our democracy and, for propaganda purposes, magnify, exaggerate and distort happenings in the United States. Not so well known, although possibly more significant, is that the liberal and conservative press abroad is constantly comparing our declarations and statements about democracy with our actual practices at home. Domestic incidents are noted and commented upon. Our discriminatory practices in education, in employment, in housing, have all been the subject of much adverse press comment in those foreign countries which we are trying to keep in the democratic camp.

While McGee v. Mississippi, 40 So. 2nd 160 (1949), was the subject of some considerable comment in Communist circles here and elsewhere, the Paris office of the American

BLEED THROUGH

Jewish Committee assembled characteristic press comment from liberal, conservative and Catholic European newspapers:

Semailles, a liberal Marseilles newspaper, said on May 18, 1951:

> In associating ourselves with the United States in the defense of liberty, we have included in the notion of liberty, a respect for all human beings, the notion of the common fraternity of all men. And it appears that in this association, we, too, have much to bring. What the world awaits from us is not cannons and atomic bombs, but the permanent and vigilant affirmation of the inalienable right of all men to be judged according to their acts and not according to the color of their skin or the latitude in which they were born. Otherwise, where is the difference between our enemies and ourselves?

An editorial, entitled "An American Tragedy", in the Vienna Arbeiter-Zeitung, one of the staunchest anti-Communist publications in Europe, said on February 4, 1951:

> The Communist reply to accusations made about the injustices and cruelties of their dictatorship, of forced labor, of the arbitrariness of their courts and their violation of human dignity, by pointing to the insincerity of American democracy which permits racial persecution and deprives millions of human beings of their equal rights on the basis of the color of their skin.
>
> One cannot appear before the world as a fighter for freedom and right when one is unable to eliminate injustice in one's own house.

L'Aube, Paris organ of the Popular Republican Movement (MRP), the second largest political party in France, led by Georges Bidault and Foreign Minister Robert Schuman, in its May 9, 1951, issue said:

> How much does a Negro weigh in a world where people of all colors are struggling with the bitter forces of nature and societies? Why is there so much noise about a trial which after all is an internal affair, not only of the United States of America, but of one of its states? He weighs exactly that of all those whose lot it is to protest an injustice. And the injustice in this instance has as its name, racism. Our reaction to injustice does not depend on the region of the world where the wrong was committed. It is the more bitter to know that it took place in a continent which gave for liberty enough of its sons not to deliver up to hatred of a poor Negro; that is what weighs heavily.

On April 7, 1950, the Cologne Welt Der Arbeit, official publication of the anti-Communist German trade unions, carried an article entitled, "The Negro Question in the U. S." That article contained the following significant language:

> In recent weeks, one found in the German press the following items: In Frankfurt-am-Main the proprietor of a cafe was fined 600 DM by American Occupation Authorities because he had ejected two colored American soldiers from his establishment. In Washington, the Capital of the U. S. A., Doctor Bunche, who made a name for himself as the UN intermediary in Palestine, was refused admittance to a movie house because he was colored. He then went to another movie house where he spoke French and was admitted because it was believed he was a foreigner. In the one case, the American authorities want foreigners to treat every colored soldier with dignity as an American citizen and punish any transgression of this principle. On the other hand, world-famous leaders of the colored population are deprived of their full equality. How are these two attitudes to be reconciled? It is only too natural that the average European can make no sense of such contradictions. The racial attitudes in the U. S. have no parallel in the entire world.

BLEED THROUGH

And finally, we have the following quotation from the liberal Le Matin of Antwerp, Belgium, in May 1951:

> The crime of racism is odious. And, without doubt, the world will never know true peace while there exist nations, peoples or races that believe themselves superior to other nations, peoples or races. It is a painful declaration to make at the moment when our American friends are presenting themselves in the United Nations as the sturdy defenders of the free world.

Legally imposed segregation in our country, in any shape, manner or form, weakens our program to build and strengthen world democracy and combat totalitarianism. In education, at the lower levels, it indelibly fixes anti-social attitudes and behavior patterns by building inter-group antagonisms. It forces a sense of limitation upon the child and destroys incentive. It produces feelings of inferiority and discourages racial self-appreciation.

For all of the reasons urged herein, State-imposed racial segregation in public schools, denies to the appellants herein, and to all similarly situated Negro children, equal protection of the laws in every meaningful sense of those words.

The judgment of the court below should be reversed.

APPENDIX

American Civil Liberties Union

The American Civil Liberties Union is a private organization composed of individual citizens. It is devoted to supporting the Bill of Rights—for everybody. Founded in 1920, it has, day in and day out, actively championed the three-fold cause of civil liberties, the heart and core of democratic government, as set forth in the Constitution and the Declaration of Independence: (1) Government by the people, grounded on freedom of inquiry and expression—speech, press, assembly and religion—for everybody; (2) specific rights guaranteed to the people, such as due process and fair trial—for everybody; and (3) equality of the people before the law—for everybody, regardless of race, color, place of birth, position, income, political opinions, or religious belief.

The Union has no cause to serve other than civil liberties. It is dedicated simply and solely to furthering the actual practice of democracy. It defends the civil liberties of everybody, including those whose anti-democratic opinions it abhors and opposes, like Communists, Nazis, Fascists and Ku Klux Klanners.

American Ethical Union

The American Ethical Union is a national association of Societies for Ethical Culture. Its purpose is to bring into close fellowship of thought and action existing Ethical Societies and to promote the establishment of new societies. It is thus devoted, on a national scale, as is each society in its local setting, to the promotion of the knowledge, the love and the practice of the right in all the relationships of life. It asserts the supreme importance of the ethical factor in all the relations of life and affirms the belief that the greatest spiritual values are to be found in man's relationship to man. Through its religious and educational programs it seeks to make the individual more adequate in his personal relationships and better able to contribute to the life of his community. The Ethical Society has as one of its objectives the inspiring words of St. Paul: "He has made of one blood all nations of men to dwell on the earth."

American Jewish Committee

The American Jewish Committee is a corporation created by an Act of the Legislature of the State of New York in 1906. Its charter states:

> The object of this corporation shall be to prevent the infraction of the civil and religious rights of Jews, in any part of the world; to render all lawful assistance and to take appropriate remedial action in the event of threatened or actual invasion or restriction of such rights, or of unfavorable discrimination with respect thereto . . .

During the forty-six years of its existence it has been one of the fundamental tenets of the organization that the welfare and security of Jews in America depend upon the preservation of constitutional guarantees. An invasion of the civil rights of any group is a threat to the safety of all groups.

For this reason the American Jewish Committee has on many occasions fought in defense of civil liberties even though Jewish interests did not appear to be specifically involved.

Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith

B'nai B'rith, founded in 1843, is the oldest civic organization of American Jews. It represents a membership of over 350,000 men and women and their families. The Anti-Defamation League was organized in 1913, as a section of the parent organization, in order to cope with racial and religious prejudice in the United States. The program developed by the League is designed to achieve the following objectives: to eliminate and counteract defamation and discrimination against the various racial, religious and ethnic groups which comprise our American people; to counteract un-American and anti-democratic activity; to advance goodwill and mutual understanding among American groups; and to encourage and translate into greater effectiveness the ideals of American democracy.

Japanese American Citizens League

The Japanese American Citizens League is the national organization of Americans of Japanese ancestry. Established in 1930, its story is an account of a group of young Americans treasuring their birthright of American citizenship, defending it and seeking to be worthy of it. Although its membership is composed primarily of Americans of Japanese ancestry, membership is open to all Americans who believe in its principles.

The purpose of the organization is to promote good citizenship, protect the rights of Americans of Japanese ancestry, and acquaint the public in general with this group of citizens toward their full acceptance into American life. The twin mottoes of "For Better Americans in a Greater America" and "Security Through Unity" express this purpose.

Unitarian Fellowship for Social Justice

The Rev. Dr. John Haynes Holmes and a group of other Unitarian clergymen established the Unitarian Fellowship for Social Justice in 1908. They sought "to sustain one another in united action against social injustice and in the realization of religious ideals in present-day society." Dr. Holmes served for three years as the Fellowship's first president.

The Fellowship concerns itself especially with freedom of conscience, the rights of minorities, the defense of public education, and substantial efforts to strengthen the United Nations and to plan for peace.

The Fellowship participates in the United Unitarian Appeal for its funds, and it is affiliated with the American Unitarian Association through the Association's Department of Adult Education and Social Relations. The society has individual members, organizational affiliates, and chapters throughout the United States and Canada in Unitarian and liberal community churches.

ON RE-ARGUMENT

BRIEF OF
AMERICAN VETERANS COMMITTEE, INC. (A. V. C.)

Amicus Curiae

PRELIMINARY STATEMENT

The American Veterans Committee, Inc., is a nation-wide organization of veterans who served honorably in the Armed Forces of the United States during World Wars I and II, and the Korean Conflict. During the 1952 Term, we filed briefs, with consent of the parties, in two of the five school segregation cases now on reargument before this Court pursuant to the Court's order of June 8, 1953 (345 U. S. 972). Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, No. 8, and Bolling v. Sharpe, No. 413, both in October Term, 1952. In those briefs we urged the following points:

(a) That racial segregation imposed by State law in public schools violates the equal protection guarantee of the Fourteenth Amendment even where the discriminatory effect of the segregation can be described as solely psychological.

(b) That compulsory racial segregation in public schools cannot be supported under any proper test.

(c) That even if the Plessy postulate of "reasonable" racial segregation were applicable to public schooling and had any vitality at present,[1] the segregation in these cases is unreasonable and therefore unconstitutional under the Plessy rule itself.

(d) That the right guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment to be free from racial discrimination by governmental authority is so basic to our free society as to have become a right constitutionally accorded to free men under the Due Process clause of the Fifth Amendment to be free from arbitrary racial discrimination by the Federal Government or agencies acting under its authority, including the District of Columbia government.

(e) That this Court's 1950 decisions in the Sweatt and McLaurin cases, dealing with racial segregation in education at the graduate school level, require the elimination of racial segregation in public schools at the levels of

[1] Our Brief in the Brown case last term (No. 8 then, No. 1 now) reminded this Court that analyses dissecting the unsound foundations of the majority opinion in Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537 (1896) are contained in the Briefs of the American Veterans Committee and the United States filed in the case of Henderson v. United States, 339 U. S. 816 (1950), No. 25, Oct. Term, 1949.

BLEED THROUGH

education involved in the present cases (elementary, junior high, and senior high, school), inasmuch as the racial segregation at any of these levels produces educational handicaps for the colored students.

(f) That equality of educational opportunity cannot be achieved within a racially segregated system.

(g) That the people are ready for and will accept racial integration in the public school systems.

In this brief on the reargument, we shall seek to present answers only on questions 4 and 5.

We have conducted researches on questions 1 and 2 (relating to the history of the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment) which convince us that it was intended to forbid in every portion of our United States every distinction and difference in treatment by or under governmental authority which is based on race or color, and to make our Constitution, as Mr. Justice Harlan memorably described it, a Constitution which "is color-blind, and neither knows nor tolerates classes among citizens." Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537, 559 (1896).[2] But we do not here recite the evidence or spell out the history—other briefs proffered to this Court will undoubtedly do so profusely.

As to question 3, we believe that our previous briefs in these cases adequately present our argument that this Court has the judicial power, and the duty, in construing the Fourteenth Amendment and its application to these cases, either directly or through the Due Process clause

---

[2] The late Mr. Chief Justice Vinson stated this understanding for a unanimous Court as follows in Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U. S. 1, 23 (1948):

> "The historical context in which the Fourteenth Amendment became a part of the Constitution should not be forgotten. Whatever else the framers sought to achieve, it is clear that the matter of primary concern was the establishment of equality in the enjoyment of basic civil and political rights and the preservation of those rights from discriminatory action on the part of the States based on considerations of race or color."

of the Fifth Amendment, to abolish racial segregation in public schools.

QUESTION 4

"4. Assuming it is decided that segregation in public schools violates the Fourteenth Amendment

(a) would a decree necessarily follow providing that, within the limits set by normal geographic school districting, Negro children should forthwith be admitted to schools of their choice, or

(b) may this Court, in the exercise of its equity powers, permit an effective gradual adjustment to be brought about from existing segregated systems to a system not based on color distinctions?"

The assumption on which question 4 is based is that this Court has ruled that racial segregation in public schools violates the Constitution and that the Negro children in these cases are entitled to education in nonsegregated schools.

I. THE NATURE OF THE RIGHT

This Court has repeatedly held, in cases involving racial discrimination, that the constitutional rights asserted by an individual against whom the racial discrimination has been imposed by governmental authority are "personal" rights, not group rights to be merged and averaged with the rights of all others of his race and then balanced against the rights of all white persons averaged as a group. Henderson v. United States, 339 U. S. 816, 825-826 (1950); Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U. S. 1, 22 (1948); Mitchell v. United States, 313 U. S. 80, 97 (1941); Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U. S. 60, 80 (1917); McCabe v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 235 U. S. 151, 161-162 (1914); Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, 305 U. S. 337, 351 (1938). This Court has also ruled that the education which a State must provide for a Negro "in conformity with the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment" must be provided for him "as soon as" it is provided for any white person. Sipuel v. Board of Regents, 332 U. S. 631 (1948). These rulings were epitomized when this Court unanimously characterized the right to secure public education without unconstitutional racial discrimination as "personal and present." Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U. S. 629, 635 (1950).

BLEED THROUGH

II. WHEN THE CHILDREN NAMED AS COMPLAINANTS SHOULD BE ADMITTED INTO NONSEGREGATED SCHOOLS.

In view of the rulings mentioned above, when this Court holds that racial segregation is unconstitutional, the Negro children who are complainants in these cases have a constitutional right to enter the schools which, on the basis of their age, educational level, residence, and other proper scholastic criteria, they could and would enter if they were labeled "white" instead of "colored." If the decision comes after the beginning of a school term, their right to equal (unsegregated) education "as soon as" others may have it becomes a right to enter that school not later than the beginning of the school term immediately following the entry of this Court's mandate. Therefore, the minor Negro complainants in these cases should be allowed to enter the schools, and at the time, mentioned in this section.

III. THE ELIMINATION OF RACIALLY SEGREGATED SCHOOLS.

In the light of the answer in the preceding section, and since all the cases here involved are class actions, we interpret questions 4 and 5 as being directed, not to the admission of the Negro children whose names appear in the pleadings in these cases, but to the general matter of eliminating racially segregated public schools.

A. Normal geographic school districting and choice of schools.

Question 4(a) seems to imply that a decree ordering admission of Negro children into schools heretofore attended solely by white children must necessarily refer to normal geographic school districting and/or to admission of the children into "schools of their choice."

The administration of public school systems is not, and need not by this Court be, thus limited. These cases do not involve modes of administering the public schools, except at one point: that the governmental authorities make no racial distinctions between children in the operation of the public school system.

The easiest way to operate a normal public school system without racial distinctions is by assigning children to schools according to their residence within normal geographic school zones. It is a factual, impersonal, and traditional criterion in administering public schools. It tends to reflect the normal neighborhood pattern, it permits easier programming of school and community needs, and it avoids the imbalance between schools which results from unrestrained migration of pupils. Nevertheless, we do not contend that the Constitutional guarantee of equal protection of the laws requires that boards of education be compelled to admit children into schools solely on geographic bases, or that the boards be compelled to permit, or be enjoined from permitting, each child to "choose" which of several public schools he will attend. Cf. Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U. S. 510 (1925); Farrington v. Tokushige, 273 U. S. 284, 298 (1927). These are matters of public school administration which are committed to the sound judgment of school officials; they are not matters to be regulated by judicial decree.

We say only that the public school authorities, no matter what distinctions they draw based on educational factors, community residence, local circumstances, or other grounds, may not distinguish between children on the basis of their racial ancestry. Accordingly, we recommend that this Court's decree, issued upon the holding that racial segregation in the public schools is unconstitutional, (a) simply forbid the school authorities from making racial distinctions or differences in treatment on the basis of race or color, by way of segregation or otherwise, in the administration of the public school system, and (b) make no requirements, one way or the other, with respect to geographic school zones or choice by children as to which school they will attend.

B. When is "forthwith."

Question 4(a) refers to the "forthwith" admission of Negro children into public schools (presumably schools previously attended solely by white children). We do not understand the word "forthwith" as meaning the day after this Court's decree is issued. Even the best run school system will require some time to adjust its records, facilities and other administrative affairs from the artificial patterns imposed by the segregated system to an integrated system which deals with children as children rather than as colors ranging from Caucasoid pink to ebony. Presumably, however, this Court will announce its decisions in these cases during Term time which generally has been between October and June. We would suppose that the school authorities in these cases could make the necessary adjustments during the months preceding the opening of schools in September.

We have no doubt, if an additional school term is required to enable the school authorities to change from the segregated to an integrated system, that the equity power of our judicial system is sufficiently comprehensive and flexible to permit such an adjustment. But we urge that if this Court frames its decree to permit the court of first instance to allow such additional time, the decree specifically impose upon the school authorities the burden of proving, by substantial and probative evidence presented to that court, the need for such additional time.

C. Integration of these schools can and will be successfully achieved

We cannot visualize what unusual circumstances may require delay in integration beyond the opening of the school term following this Court's announcement of its decisions that segregation in public school education is unconstitutional. The Delaware schools involved in No. 10 (Gebhart v. Belton) are now integrated and operate without difficulty; and the Attorney General of Delaware candidly concedes that the Delaware authorities "do not anticipate any serious problems of adjustment" (Brief for Petitioners on Reargument in Gebhart v. Belton, No. 10, p. 44). The Kansas schools involved in No. 1 (Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka) can admittedly be integrated without difficulty; not only did the Assistant Attorney General of Kansas say so last Term at the Bar of this Court, but the Board of Education of Topeka has already integrated some of the schools here involved.

The District of Columbia picture is equally clear. We are confident, on the basis of close and considerable analysis of, and experience with, the District of Columbia milieu, that integration of its dual school system could, when the legal bars are removed, proceed rapidly, peacefully, and successfully. Indeed, so rapidly has integration advanced in the District that public school segregation is quite out of tune with the rest of the community.[3]

Intimations that violence beyond the control of the District of Columbia authorities would result from desegregation of its schools, such as were contained in the brief filed last Term by the respondents in the Bolling case referring (at p. 23) to "attitudes which are antipathetical to the co-mingling of the races in schools or otherwise" and stating that "racial tensions exist and racial clashes have occurred considerably further north," are simply without substance.

It is significant that this Court's recent decision ending racial segregation in the public restaurants of the District of Columbia was followed by complete acceptance of non-segregation without any disturbances or friction. District of Columbia v. John R. Thompson Co., Inc., 346 U. S. 100 (June 8, 1953).

The District's peaceful acceptance of integration in other equally "sensitive" areas such as swimming pools, theatres, private and parochial schools, parks, play areas, department stores, etc., in all public buildings, and in many other areas of daily living, demonstrates how flimsy is any intimation of possible violence. See article cited in footnote 3.

Indeed, the school officials of the District of Columbia have already devoted considerable study to the "plans, procedures and techniques of transition from" the segregated to a nonsegregated system if and when this Court decides that racial segregation in public schools is unconstitutional.[4] The Superintendent of D. C. schools

[4] In our previous Brief (pp. 7-8, in Bolling v. Sharpe, No. 413, Oct. Term, 1952) we suggested that the District of Columbia Board of Education "is striving to mitigate the many racial inequalities in the school system."

We now confess error as to this statement. We had relied on the accuracy of the self-serving statements by the Superintendent of Schools that all possible efforts were being made to eliminate the shortages of teachers and other inequalities in Division 2 (colored). Events during the past year make it appear that the Board's efforts are simply to relieve the extraordinary pressures of the most glaring deficiencies in that Division. They are not intended to "equalize" the facilities between Division 1 and Division 2. This has been admitted by the Superintendent of Schools. See Hearings on 1954 D. C. Appropriation bill (H.R. 5471), Subcom. of Senate Comm. on Appro., 83rd Cong., 1st sess., p. 172. Even if they would, the District authorities cannot follow in the footsteps of those State authorities who seek to avoid the legal repudiation of the Plessy doctrine by promising to spend millions of dollars to provide "separate and equal" facilities. A charitable view, perhaps, is that the District Board of Education realizes that equalization is impossible within the segregated system and therefore is simply marking time until this Court removes the legal bar to integration. The result, however, is that the Board has sloughed onto this Court the burden and responsibility for establishing moral treatment of the District's school children which the Board itself ought to carry.

characterized as "very helpful" and "thoughtful" the 160 written statements submitted by "the organized citizenry of Washington" when the Board of Education invited "statements expressing their ideas on the mechanics of integration of the schools should the present system of segregation be abolished by the Supreme Court's decision, and also on the methods to be employed to educate the public for any change which may be required." "The Superintendent and the officers will not be unprepared in the event that major changes in the organization are required." Public Schools of the District of Columbia, Report of the Superintendent of Schools to the Board of Education, 1952-1953, pp. iii-iv (emphasis supplied).

The other two cases here involved, which arise from Virginia and South Carolina, do not require different treatment by this Court. Significantly, although the appellees in the Virginia case (Davis v. County School Board of Prince Edward County, No. 4) stated that segregation was designed to prevent violence and reduce resentment, they frankly admitted that "The passage of time has removed violence and substantially removed resentment in Virginia." Brief for Appellees, No. 191, Oct. Term, 1952, p. 17. In South Carolina, integration of the public schools will involve a greater emotional adjustment than in the other cases. But we believe the people of South Carolina can and will make that adjustment. The events of World War II and its aftermaths have in the past several years brought about a vast reorientation of the community attitudes which formerly buttressed racial segregation. More and more, the people of the South are striving to discard the discriminations which grew from previous prejudices.[4a] In ever growing degree it is apparent that they would travel even faster toward that objective were it not for the lag of the law.

South Carolinians respect the Constitution. They will, under a positive ruling by the highest Court of the land that racial segregation is unconstitutional, comply with that ruling in their public schools. The more positive the ruling, the greater will be its acceptance.

D. The law versus lawlessness.

In any event, the possibility of local incident due to racial friction, would provide, as this Court has time and again reiterated, no relevant legal basis for depriving law abiding persons of their legal rights. Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U. S. 60, 80-81 (1917); Mitchell v. United States, 313 U. S. 80, 97 (1941); Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U. S. 1, 21 (1948). QUESTION 5

"5. On the assumption on which questions 4(a) and (b) are based, and assuming further that this Court will exercise its equity powers to the end described in question 4(b),

(a) should this Court formulate detailed decrees in these cases;

(b) if so, what specific issues should the decrees reach;

(c) should this Court appoint a special master to hear evidence with a view to recommending specific terms for such decrees;

(d) should this Court remand to the courts of first instance with directions to frame decrees in these cases, and if so what general directions should the decrees of this Court include and what procedures should the courts of first instance follow in arriving at the specific terms of more detailed decrees?"

I. WHAT THIS COURT'S DECREE SHOULD CONTAIN

This Court should not undertake, either itself or vicariously through a special master, a detailed study of local conditions and educational problems such as would be necessary to formulate the specific terms of decrees which will foresee and meet every possible contingency concerning the many individuals and circumstances involved in the readjustment of school districts, educational methods, patterns of pupil attendance, etc., to meet the over-riding requirements of the Constitution. Such problems, if submitted to the judicial ken at all, are properly the initial concern of courts of first instance which, whatever their lack concerning great constitutional issues, are more appropriate tribunals for dealing with local problems. But even the courts of first instance cannot meet all problems in an identical way. Differences in facts and unforeseen circumstances may compel variations in approach, both in substance and procedure. We therefore think this Court should remand these cases to the courts of first instance with only the following directions:

(a) That the courts of first instance order and enjoin the respective boards of education:

(1) to admit and educate the named minor complainants in these cases, if then qualified in all respects that a white child would be qualified, and without regard to his race or color, in such school as a white child similarly situated would be admitted and educated; the admission to be made at the beginning of the school term immediately following the issuance of this Court's decision.[5]

(2) to refrain, in the administration of their respective school systems, from making any dis-

[5] Such a provision would apparently be moot in No. 1 (Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka) and No. 10 (Gebhart v. Belton), to the extent that the complainants in those cases have already been admitted to unsegregated education.

BLEED THROUGH

tinction, or providing any difference in treatment or education, solely on the basis of race or color, with respect to any pupil or any child who seeks admission in any school as a pupil; this injunction to become effective immediately prior to the beginning of the school term next following the issuance of this Court's decision.

(b) That the court of first instance retain jurisdiction of the cases, at least during the period of transition, to deal, upon motion by either side, with any special problems which may arise in complying with the provisions mentioned above.

II. THE PRINCIPLES WHICH SHOULD GOVERN ANY "GRADUALISM" POLICY.

The suggestions and recommendations we have just made are based on the thesis that effective adjustment to a nonsegregated system does not require detailed administrative supervision by this Court or any special limitations to slow down the normal functioning of its decree. But if this Court determines that "an effective gradual adjustment . . . to a system not based on color distinctions" requires slower implementation of its decision holding racial segregation in public schools unconstitutional,[6] we urge that this Court apply such "gradualism" policy in a manner (a) that would not deprive any individual child of its personal and present rights under our fundamental Charter of Liberties, and (b) that would not serve local bodies with an excuse for interminably dragging their heels.

[6] As indicated above, we assume that Questions 4 and 5 were intended to apply to the admission, not of the named complainants, but only of those members of the class not named as parties in these cases. In any event, we think that the principles mentioned in the text of this section require granting to the named complainants the relief urged in section II of our answers to Question 4. To delay the complainants' enjoyment of their rights after this Court has announced their rights would be to deny them their rights.

III. THE "VOLUNTARY" METHOD OF GRADUAL ADJUSTMENT.

One method which may slow down the process of integration without violating the rights of individual children, or operating on a 1000 years schedule, is to permit school boards to operate without readjustment until such time as children desiring integrated education apply for admission to schools hitherto attended by children of another race. In many areas, there may be a diffidence to voluntary mixing of school children heretofore separately educated which may result in slower integration than would occur where the compulsory school attendance laws are invoked to aid integration. When a child applies for admission to a school theretofore attended by children of other races, the process of readjustment to integration will and should begin. Whatever problems may arise can and should be dealt with then. The duty of the school authorities is to maintain orderly school programs without regard to race or color, and to refrain from denying admission to any child in any school, and from treating any child differently, at any time, on the basis of race or color.

One advantage of this "voluntary" method of achieving gradual adjustment is that it would lean heavily on the state of readiness each local community may have for integration. One of its disadvantages would be the tendency to substitute the irresponsibility and uncertainty of "mores" for orderly application of the compulsory school laws in the context of constitutional requirements.

All other methods of gradual adjustment to racial integration of the public schools which we have considered either violate one or both of the principles mentioned in the preceding section, or are, we think, appropriate only for administrative or community action. Thus, procedures such as integrating only a limited and specific number of schools, or grades, per year, would wholly disregard the rights and needs of individual children seeking non-segregated education. Moreover, authorizing such arbitrary methods would encourage evasiveness and procrastination in conforming to the requirements of the Constitution. The techniques of intercultural education, use of media of mass communication, training of police, teachers and administrators, etc., are obviously not appropriate for utilization in judicial decrees.

We repeat and stand firm on our recommendations (a) that this Court refrain from formulating detailed decrees in these cases either sua sponte or upon recommendations by a special master, and (b) that the task of monitoring "gradual adjustment", if it is to be undertaken by the judiciary, be delegated to courts of first instance with their larger familiarity with local conditions, subject to appellate review of any error committed.

This Court's decrees should, we urge, follow the principles discussed above, but not attempt beyond that to circumscribe narrowly either the terms of the lower courts' decrees or their procedures in arriving at specific terms. We concur with the Attorney General of Delaware that "the details" of gradual adjustment "cannot be worked out in a vacuum; and if this Court, or any lower Court, should attempt at this time to work out a general scheme, it would probably create more problems than it would solve." Brief for Petitioners on Reargument in Gebhart v. Belton, No. 10, p. 44. The dynamics of integration require much flexibility; and it is elementary that "courts deal with concrete legal issues, presented in actual cases, not abstractions." United States v. Appalachian Elec. Power Co., 311 U. S. 377, 423 (1940).

IV. "GRADUALISM" BY THE JUDICIARY IS UNNECESSARY.

We desire to emphasize that the above suggestions concerning "gradual adjustment", sincerely made by us to aid this Court if it chooses to follow such a policy, are not, in our opinion, indispensable for effective adjustment to integrated education. We think it is unnecessary for this Court to espouse a formal policy of "gradualism" now. It was not deemed necessary, and its absence produced no difficulties, when this Court decreed the end of racial discrimination, whether by segregation or otherwise, in voting,[7] interstate travel,[8] land ownership,[9] D. C. restaurants,[10] employment,[11] graduate education,[12] jury service,[13] etc.

Experience shows that "wherever segregation has been abolished, no blood has flowed."[14] The experience of public school integration in New Jersey following the adoption in 1947 of a constitutional provision forbidding segregated schools is particularly instructive. Desegregation was by constitutional command. Of many different methods used in the various communities to integrate the

APPEAL FROM THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF KANSAS.

BRIEF OF AMERICAN FEDERATION OF TEACHERS AS AMICUS CURIAE.

As a contribution to the solution of the important issues involved in the "segregated school cases" the American Federation of Teachers submits this brief upon some of the historical and legal questions raised by this Honorable Court in proposing a re-argument.

The Opinions Below, Questions Presented, Statutes and Constitutions Involved, and Statements of Facts have been stated in previous briefs filed in these causes.

Summary of Argument.

The arguments presented in our previous briefs Amicus Curiae and those presented herewith are summarized in the Introduction to the Argument.

ARGUMENT.

Introduction:

Need to consider cases in broad aspects.

The American Federation of Teachers which is dedicated to "education for democracy and democracy in education" is deeply interested in the cases before the Supreme Court challenging the constitutionality of segregation in public elementary and secondary schools. The arguments the Federation submitted in October 1952 against segregated public education are equally valid in 1953 and we urge their favorable re-consideration.

We have studied carefully the historical and legal questions raised by the court in asking for a re-argument of the cases this year. While it is essential to have accurate and clear cut answers to these questions, the American Federation of Teachers believes that the interests of the United States, both national and international, demand the consideration of other factors as well as those raised by the Court.

In addition to the arguments presented in our brief October, 1952, namely:

> 1. The Constitutions and Statutes of states providing for segregation of students in the public schools, violate the requirements of the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The doctrine of "separate but equal" facilities is fallacious . . .
>
> 2. Segregation in public schools inevitably results in inferior educational opportunities for Negroes . . .
>
> 3. Segregation in public schools deprives the Negro student of an important element of the education process and he is thereby denied the equal educational opportunities mandated by the Fourteenth Amendment . . .

BLEED THROUGH

the Federation urges the abolition of segregated schooling on the elementary and secondary levels for the following reasons:

I. The strengthening and preservation of a democratic society demands an educated citizenry.

II. The intent of the 14th amendment was to make the Negro a citizen and protect his voting rights.

III. To exercise his right of choice effectively a voter must not only be educated but educated among all those who make up the total community.

IV. An integrated school system will aid tremendously in developing harmonious relations among the people of the South and thereby throughout the country.

Conclusion.

A decision in favor of integrated schooling on every level is necessary, not only to give substance to our declared principles but to win over the peoples of Asia and Africa to a belief in the sincerity of the United States.

I.

THE STRENGTHENING AND PRESERVATION OF A DEMOCRATIC SOCIETY DEMANDS AN EDUCATED CITIZENRY.

A democratic society is founded on the belief that all men are equal and capable of governing themselves. It holds further that men create the institutions of government for the purpose of safeguarding their rights of "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness." To govern wisely, as well as to use effective checks upon governmental authority to prevent abuses, requires an alert, well-educated citizenry.

The early founders of this country were well aware of this need for the maintenance of popular government. They gave many evidences of their concern for public education in their writings and in their activities.

President George Washington in his first inaugural address stated:

> "Knowledge is in every country the surest basis of public happiness. In one in which the measures of government receive their impressions so immediately from the sense of the community, as in ours, it is proportionably essential. To the security of a free constitution it contributes in various ways, by convincing those who are intrusted with the public administration that every valuable end of government is best answered by the enlightened confidence of the people and by teaching the people themselves to know and value their own rights, to discern and provide against invasions of them; to distinguish between oppression and the necessary exercise of lawful authority; between burdens proceeding from a disregard to their convenience and those resulting from the exigencies of society; to discriminate the spirit of liberty from that of licentiousness, cherishing the first, avoiding the last and uniting a speedy but temperate 'vigilance against encroachments with an inviolable respect to the laws'[1]

Washington not only urged the establishment of a national university but, in his will, left 50 shares in the Potomac Company for such an institution to which the youth of fortune and talents from all parts thereof (of the U. S.) might be sent for the completion of their education in all branches of polite literature; in arts and sciences; and in acquiring knowledge in the principles of politics and good governments.[2]

In his Farewell Address, Washington left this final admonition; "Promote then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of government gives force to public opinion, it is essential that public opinion should be enlightened.[3]

John Adams in his DISSERTATION ON THE CANON FEUDAL LAW: "But the fact is certain; and whenever a general knowledge and sensibility have prevailed among the people, arbitrary government and every kind of oppression have lessened and disappeared in proportion."[4] He stated later in another essay: "Thoughts on Government"—" . . . Laws for the liberal education of youth, especially of the lower classes of people, are so extremely wise and useful, that to a humane and generous mind, no expense for this purpose would be thought extravagant." [5]

Thomas Jefferson's career was filled with activities in behalf of public education because he was convinced an informed public opinion was essential to maintaining freedom. As a member of the Virginia legislature he introduced bills for providing the state with a system of free public schools. He wanted especially written on his grave marker that he established the University of Virginia. His authorship of the Land Act of 1784, established the precedent followed in the Northwestern Ordinance of 1787 of granting land by the national government for the support of education.

Like Washington, he called attention, in his first inaugural address to the importance of education and the need for the national government to be concerned about it. "... The diffusion of information I deem (one) of the essential principles of our government and consequently (one) which ought to shape its administration" [6]

In a letter to James Madison he stated:

> "Above all things I hope the education of the common people will be attended to; convinced that on their good sense we may rely with the utmost security for the preservation of a due degree of liberty." [7]

The working man too realized the importance of education and a generation later, became quite vocal in his unions and political groups in demanding free public schools. He urged this not only for the self improvement of the worker but also for his more effective functioning as a citizen. At a New York State convention of the Workingman's Party in 1830 one address stated in part:

> "The right of suffrage which we enjoy cannot be understandingly exercised by those whose want of education deprives them of the means of acquiring such information as is necessary for a proper and correct discharge of this duty."[8]

In a circular to the workingmen of Philadelphia (1830) by the Workingmen's Republican Association of the Northern Liberties, the organization made this appeal: "Let the productive classes then unite for the preservation of their free institutions and, by providing for all the children in the Commonwealth republican education preserve our liberties from the dangers of foreign invasion or domestic infringement."[9]

A trade union of Newark demanded education for their children as "a matter of right and duty". Its members argued: "Education alone, and that generally diffused is the only prop that will support the fabric of Democracy from being crushed beneath the weight of monopolized and moneyed artistocracy."[10]

And the workers of the First Congressional District of Pennsylvania (1830) supported the candidacy of Stephen Simpson because "he is a friend and indefatigable defender of a system of general education which will place citizens of this extensive republic on an equality: a system that will fit the poor as well as the rich to become our future legislators; a system that will bring the children of the poor and the rich to mix together as a band of republican brethren; united in youth in acquisition of knowledge they will grow up together jealous of naught but the republican character of their country and present to the world the sublime spectacle of a truly republican government in practice as well as in theory." [11]

As a result of the concern of the founders of this country and the persistent demands of labor unions, the free public school has become an integral part of American life. No other institution gives as tangible an evidence of American faith in the democratic way of life as the free public school and none is so generally supported by the great mass of people. It is ironic that this American institution is permitted by Southern State laws to violate and desecrate this faith so flagrantly and constantly.

THE INTENT OF THE 14TH AMENDMENT WAS TO MAKE THE NEGRO A CITIZEN AND PROTECT HIS VOTING RIGHTS.

The 14th amendment, by stating specifically that "all persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside" [12] intended to make the Negro a citizen. It also intended to make the Negro a voter and protect his voting rights by placing a penalty upon the states that disfranchised him—namely, cutting down the state's representation in Congress. Section 2 of the amendment states; ". . . But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for president and vice president of the United States, representatives to Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a state, or the members of the legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such state . . . the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens twenty-one years of age in such state." [13]

The debates in the 39th and the 41st Congresses and the state conventions and in the state legislatures which ratified the 14th amendment clearly indicate that both the proponents and opponents of the amendment realized that it protected the citizenship and voting rights of the Negro. Moreover, they show that the debaters were conscious of the issue of segregation in education. The Congressional Globe reports on February 19, 1866 that Senator Yates of Illinois while making a speech in the Senate for the proposed 14th Amendment said:

> " . . . the senate at this session have passed the bill (S. 61) to protect all persons . . . in their civil rights . . . here, sir, I contend, we have fully established the principle . . . protecting the inhabitants, of every race and color, without regard to any previous condition of slavery in all their civil and political rights. . . " [14]

A week later in the House Representative Rogers of New Jersey while arguing against the 14th Amendment stated that:

> "In the State of Pennsylvania there are laws which make a distinction with regard to the schooling of white children and the schooling of black children. It is provided that certain schools shall be designated and set apart for white children, and certain other schools designated and set apart for black children. Under this amendment, Congress would have power to compel the state to provide for white children and black children to attend the same school, upon the principle that all the people . . . shall have equal protection in the rights of life, liberty, and property, and all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." [15]

For a short period after the adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment there was no segregation at the University of South Carolina. Indeed it was not until the Tillman Constitutional Convention of 1895 that separate schools were provided for Negro and white children. Yet in 1868, Governor Orr voiced the opinion that the new amendment would bring immediate dire results. He addressed the Assembly as follows:

". . . The Constitution provides that there shall be kept open, at least six months in each year, one or more schools in each school district. . . . Another Section, however, declares that all the public schools, colleges and universities of the State, supported in whole or in part by public funds, shall be free and open to all the children, and youths of the State, without regard to race or color.

If it shall be attempted to establish schools where both races are to be taught, no provision being made for their separation, the whole system will result in a disastrous failure. The prejudices of race, whether just or unjust, exists in full force not more in South Carolina than in New England and the West. In the last named localities, separate schools are provided for white and colored children, and in a community where these prejudices prevail in so strong a degree, how unreasonable is it to attempt the organization of mixed schools. It cannot but result in constant feuds and collisions between the children, in which the parents respectively, will necessarily take up the quarrels and the entire community thus be involved in continual tumult; the consequence of misguided efforts of unwise persons." [16]

In 1868 under the spirit of the Fourteenth Amendment, the people of Louisiana ratified a constitution by a vote of 66,152 to 48,739. This constitution provided:

> "The general assembly shall establish at least one free public school in every parish throughout the State, and shall provide for its support by taxation or otherwise. All children of this State between the years of six and twenty-one shall be admitted to the public schools or other institutions of learning sustained or established by the State in common, without distinction of race, color, or previous condition. There shall be no separate schools or institutions of learning established exclusively for any race by the State of Louisiana." [17]

By 1898 the political climate had so changed that the new constitution decreed separate schools based on race in this fashion:

> "There shall be free public schools for the white and colored races separately established by the General Assembly, throughout the State, for the education of all the children of the State between the ages of six and eighteen years; provided, that where kindergarten schools exist, children between the ages of four and six may be admitted into said schools." [18]

Virginia's Constitutional Convention of 1867-68 brought into prominence one James W. Hunnicutt who summarized the position of his caucus of the Republican Party in a speech on January 9, 1869 this way:

> ". . . Our banner is thrown to the breeze, and upon it is written 'the unconditional preservation of the Union.' That is the first plank. The second is, 'a republican form of government.' The third is, 'the equal rights of all men, civil and political, before the law, without regard to race, caste or color.' The last is, 'the establishment of systems of general education for all the children in the land without regard to race, caste or color.' these are the objects of the members on this side of the House." [19]

Even clearer language is that used by the Fredericksburg's convention which besides electing delegates to the constitutional convention adopted this resolution:

> "that our candidates must pledge themselves to sustain the principles of the Republican Party, especially the equal political rights of all men in all respects; a system of common schools in which no distinctions shall be made on account of color and race, a general provision for the poor and a just and equitable system of taxation." [20]

It is apparent in our opinion, that the delegates to the convention of 1868 were conscious of the problem of segregated public schools. Many of them thought that the Fourteenth Amendment covered this point adequately and consequently specific reference to it in the State Constitution was not necessary. During the debates, a resolution by Dr. Thomas Bayne, a delegate from Norfolk, which spelled out non-segregation in public schools, met defeat as did likewise a provision to establish separate schools by Eustace Gibson.

The first State Legislature which was dominated by conservatives made segregated public schools legitimate. The importance of this move in creating a segregated society is obvious in the letter of W. H. Ruffner, the first superintendent of public instruction, who in answering the assumption of Reverend R. L. Dabney that education will lead inevitably to "amalgamation" observes:

> ". . . But if under the ordinary associations of life there would be any tendencies in the direction of amalgamation, the school system would oppose a powerful barrier to such tendency. In fact, of all the public arrangements of Southern society, the school system alone renders a bold, emphatic testimony to the immiscibility of the races. We find Negroes in our churches, our theatres, our courthouses, our rail-cars, our halls of legislation; but there is one place where no Negro enters, and that is a WHITE PUBLIC SCHOOL HOUSE. The law separates the races in education, and in nothing else. The effect of this separation enters into the educational thought and training of the young, and establishes the habits and etiquette of society with a firmness that nothing else is doing, or could do. . . ." [21]

Thirty years passed before the "plans" of the superintendent bore fruit as a fait accompli. The General Assembly of Virginia extended the segregated principle to other fields according to this time schedule:

1900, Chapter 226, Segregation in Railroads.

1900, Chapter 312, Segregation in Steamboats.

1918, Chapter 301, Segregation in Penitentiaries.

A consideration of ALL of the historical evidence on the question of segregation in public education in the southern states will confirm our findings in Virginia, South Carolina, and Louisiana. These affirm that the political leaders during the late eighteen sixties possessed an understanding of the effect of segregation on our public institutions and that Negroes enjoyed a fair measure of freedom. They also demonstrate that the Negro gradually lost full citizenship privileges by the turn of the century, if provisions on segregation in state constitutions and statutes or actual practices are our criteria. In a sense then, this brief constitutes an argument to restore the rights of the Negro guaranteed him originally in the Fourteenth Amendment.

III.

TO EXERCISE HIS RIGHT OF CHOICE EFFECTIVELY A VOTER MUST NOT ONLY BE EDUCATED AMONG ALL THOSE WHO MAKE UP THE TOTAL COMMUNITY.

So necessary is education to a wise use of the ballot that most states have laws that voters must be able to read and write as a minimum requirement for voting. The reading requirement, whether on the elementary or the more advanced level has a content suited for adults who are to help vote the kind of laws and the type of leadership their communities will have.

In South Carolina it is the state constitution that is considered appropriate:

> "Any person who shall apply for registration after January 1, 1898, if otherwise qualified, shall be registered: provided, that he or she can both read and write any section of this constitution submitted to him or her by the registration officer. . . ."

In New York on the other hand, it is a literacy test that is required:

> " 'new voter,' within the meaning of this article, is a person who, if he is entitled to vote in this state, should have become so entitled on or after January first, nineteen hundred twenty-two, and has not already voted in a general election in the State of New York after making proof of ability to read and write English, in the manner provided in section one hundred sixty-eight."

The New York Board of Regents provides each applicant with one of a possible twelve examinations on subjects such as: The Hoover Dam, Thomas Edison, The Ausable Chasm, Samuel Adams, polio, Charles Lindbergh, Washington at Newburgh. He is required to answer correctly six out of eight questions on the topic in writing. Thus not only must the new voter read and write, he must also comprehend.

But it is not considered sufficient for a voter just to be able to read about issues and candidates. He is expected to have a more intimate knowledge of the individuals running for office and be able to weigh and judge in choosing among them. The necessity for the voter to know the merits and demerits of candidates is further attested by the "short ballot" movement. This aims to present to the voter only a few candidates so that he may know each more thoroughly.

Candidates too, are required to live in the districts from which they are elected, not only that they may serve the people more effectively, but that the people may be represented by one whom they know well. Richard S. Childs in his article The Short Ballot, makes this point when he asserts:

> ". . . That the candidates should be conspicuous is vital. The people must be able to see what they are doing; they must know the candidate, otherwise they are not in control of the situation, but are only going through the motions of controlling."[23]

Childs goes on to show how important this is to the development of democratic government by this comment:

> ". . . If the government is to be brought within the sure control of the people, the ballot must be brought within the sure control of the individual voter. We must get on a basis where the real intentions of the average voter finds intelligent expression on the entire ballot so as to produce normally the kind of government the voters want whether that kind be good or bad."[24]

It is here that the public school plays a significant role, for it is in their learning together that prospective voters get to know and understand each other, learn the problems of their respective communities and discover those who may provide desirable leadership. More and more schools are being used not only as training ground for political aspirants, but also for forums where these aspirants meet representatives of the entire community and discuss issues with them face to face.

The public schools then of the South must be integrated to serve the needs of all citizens, both white and black, in the effective exercise of their ballot—one of the main props of a democratic society.

IV.

AN INTEGRATED SCHOOL SYSTEM WILL AID TREMENDOUSLY IN DEVELOPING HARMONIOUS RELATIONS AMONG ALL GROUPS IN THE UNITED STATES.

The tensions and conflicts between races in the United States has resulted not from integrations but from the segregation and discrimination in custom and in law which have been inflicted upon the Negro. In no institution has this discrimination been so glaring as in the public school system of the South where the inequalities in facilities for white and Negro children daily incite contempt on one hand and bitterness on the other. A graphic picture of this inequality is presented by Edwin L. Brook in his article: "Toward a Non-Segregated South."[14]

> "Consider, for example, my own community, a small town in Northern Louisiana. It has a fine brick school plant for whites, with grammar and high school departments well equipped for an enrollment of about 250 pupils. It has gymnasium, lunch room, home economics building and agricultural building. On the outskirts of town there is a Negro school consisting of wood-frame buildings which are over-crowded and inadequately equipped. There is no gymnasium and the facilities on all levels cannot compare with those of the white school. Yet even as it is, the Negro school represents a tremendous advance over previous condi> tions. It was not many years ago that the students were meeting in a tent in a near-by Negro churchyard. Now a number of small rural schools have been consolidated and the present building erected."

Contrast this with areas where integration has been the practice. Here there are no humiliating distinctions. The Negro student is accepted and is recognized for what he is —one of the many varieties of an American.

After the Sweatt-McLaurin decision, 339 U. S. 629, 637 which made integration possible in state colleges and universities in the South, Negro students were accepted without any difficulty. Today between 1000 and 2000 of them are studying on over 80 campuses as irrefutable testimony to this fact. On the elementary and secondary level integration has followed suit in areas like Arizona, New Mexico, Southern Illinois, Ohio, and New Jersey. Even the private preparatory schools of New England States have joined this democratic development. The Yale Law Journal summarizes the trend:

> ". . . As a result of the recent Supreme Court cases, over a thousand Negroes have been peacefully integrated into southern graduate and professional schools. Social ostracism has not been as great as was expected. Furthermore, in Illinois, Indiana, and New Jersey, state legislatures have forced reluctant communities to eliminate segregation in their grade schools. Despite local resentment and protest, the integration of Negro and white children has generally proceeded peacefully.
>
> "Other forms of desegration have recently occurred in the South and despite sporadic racial violence the transition has in general been peaceful. In some instances the desegration has occurred in activities where southern insistence on segregation has been most adamant. Thus, in St. Louis and Washington, D. C., in spite of strong public protest, segregation in municipal swimming pools has been successfully prohibited. Experience in the elimination of segregation in public parks, sporting events, theatres and movies has been the same. Likewise, in the armed forces, where resistance to racial integration has been traditional, segregation is fast disappearing at the command of the President. In the allied fields of racial discrimination, such as white primaries, all-white juries and segregated interstate travel, court orders have partially overcome deeply rooted patterns of discrimination. All of this progress has been made in the face of continuous threats of violence and non-conformance by southern leaders.

BLEED THROUGH

"These instances of southern adjustment to enforced desegregation strongly suggest that the normal reaction of the South to Supreme Court decisions is not violent. Generally, the only resistance takes the form of attempted circumvention. Tighter decrees and persistent enforcement ultimately overcome even this type of resistance. Thus, there is little reason for the courts to allow threats of violence and civil strife to delay desegregation.

"In the long run it is well established that segregation intensifies rather than eases racial tension. Instead of encouraging racial cooperation, segregation fosters mutual fear and suspicion which is the basis of racial violence. Thus, every inroad in racial segregation which the courts can effect maximizes the opportunity for eventual racial reconciliation."[25]

THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF TEACHERS feels that desegregation on the American scene is successfully proceeding in various ways—by voluntary community action, by legislative acts, by judicial review, by military and religious authority and by individual initiative.

In all of these cases the question of appropriate method, timing and who should take the initiative, arises. We believe that the public school being one of the molders for our citizens of tomorrow should take the lead; we believe the time is now—we believe we have the 'know-how'—we believe the most logical authority is the Supreme Court.

The experience of the United States Department of Defense can be of service to us in this connection. The armed forces, once completely segregated has in three years, almost become totally desegregated. Listen to John A. Hannah, Assistant Secretary of Defense, in an interview on ending segregation:

> Q: Have you solved the problem of segregation in the Army?
>
> A: I think remarkable progress has been made. The Air Force and the Navy are completely integrated. The Army is about 95 per cent integrated.
>
> Q: What does that mean?
>
> A: That means that there are no colored men in the Navy or the Air Force who are serving in "colored" units. They are all serving in integrated units. And that is true of 95 per cent of the colored men in the Army. We still have a few colored units, but they are being done away with rapidly. In eight months there will be no non-integrated units in the Army. Universally the answer from our commanders is that it is desirable and works out very well in spite of all contrary predictions—it works very well.
>
> Q: There has been no resistance, no violence or demonstrations about it?
>
> A: No. The colored men are very effective members of the armed forces. Some of them are more effective than others, of course, depending upon their background and training.
>
> Q: Are they adept for any particular types of jobs?
>
> A: We don't know that yet.
>
> Q: How many colored officers are there in command positions in these integrated setups?
>
> A: There are a goodly number. There are not as many colored officers proportionately as there are white officers.
>
> Q: Are they commanding white troops?

BLEED THROUGH

A: Yes, and there are a great many more than there used to be because, as the colored officers begin to demonstrate ability, they begin to move up.

Q: Is there a quota system?

A: None.

Q: How many Negroes are there in the Army?

A: I do not recall the exact number, but about 13 per cent of the Army is colored.

Q: Are you thinking about lowering physical standards at all?

A: No. There have been requests from the services for the raising of the mental qualification at the minimum level. At the present time, we require each of the services to take a certain percentage of the four mental categories. Whether a man enlists or comes in in the draft, they are all given examinations at the examining stations and are put into one of four categories, and then we require each of the services to take the same percentage of each of the categories. The services think they are very definitely hindered by being required to take too many Category 4 people—the people in the lowest mental category.[26]

New Jersey, like Illinois and Ohio, is contiguous with states that have a segregated pattern. New Jersey's experience in desegregation in the southern part of the state is brought out by Joseph L. Bustard, Assistant Commissioner of Education in a speech delivered at Howard University, April 16, 1952 when he reported:

"... A very recent survey in New Jersey shows that at the present time, forty of the forty-three school districts involved were completely integrated as of September 1951. The remaining three districts all have taken some steps toward integration, but in all three of these districts, building programs are underway, that when finished, will make integration complete.

"Sometimes the question arises should integration in the public schools follow or lead movements for integration in other areas of community life. The New Jersey experience would seem to indicate that the schools can and should lead. Practically all of the segregated schools had segregated parent-teacher associations. Today, in almost all of the districts affected, there are strong integrated PTA's with Negroes serving as officers and executive committee members. In several communities, Y.M.C.A.'s that were segregated have become integrated. In a few communities, Negroes are serving as members of boards of education and in some others, policemen have been appointed and handle the same type of assignment as any other officer on the force. In fact, even a few of the North Jersey cities have restudied old school zones, that at one time or another had been jerrymandered, and as a result have announced new school district lines.

"While New Jersey cannot furnish any one formula, it can testify that complete integration in the public schools can and will work. It may even be safe to say once more, that the way to learn to do a thing is to do it, and in this respect, New Jersey has proven again that the best way to integrate is to do it."[27]

In most instances of successful integration in public school the first step seems to be the establishment of legal authority. William W. Barnes in a review of the methods used by a local board of education in solving this problem writes:

". . . In conclusion, therefore, it is safe to say that the following policies and attitudes must be a part of any desegregation program undertaken in any community, whether it be large or small. First, there must be some legal authority giving initial impetus to an integration program. Second, an objective survey of all installations, faculties, pupil compositions and community attitudes should be made. Third, and perhaps most important, once the decision to desegregate is made, the carrying out of the plans made must be done in a positive manner with no deviation, apology, exception or vacillation whatsoever. If these three major suggestions are carried out, the successful experiences of over forty school districts in the State of New Jersey indicate that the integration of white and colored school systems can be accomplished to the satisfaction of all the people affected." [28]

The majority of the people in the south will accept a Supreme Court decision outlawing segregation on the elementary and secondary level as they accepted the decision outlawing the white primary. Especially will they do so, if the law-enforcement agencies on the national, state and local levels all indicate publicly that they will not countenance anything but orderly acceptance of a Supreme Court decision in favor of an integrated school system.

Conclusion.

The United States, in the cold war with Soviet Russia and its satellites is disturbed by the "neutralism" of India and other sections of the darker world. The factor of color has as dominant a part in this neutralism as the unwillingness to be drawn into a conflict between these powers. Constantly in the U. N. and in the press of these countries there is pointed out the gap between our professions of democracy and our practice in so far as people of color are concerned. The western world is still too unaware of the upheavals taking place among the darker people of the world and too indifferent to the significance of these upheavals for the white world.

In so far as we eliminate among our citizens barriers based on race and color, to that degree we are helping to create a "more perfect union here" and a reservoir of good will for us in the vast world of color.

A decision outlawing segregation in education on the elementary and secondary level will not only advance the educational opportunities of both whites and Negroes in the South, but it will also give convincing evidence to millions in Asia and Africa that the United States is willing to give more than lip service to the principles on which it is founded.

Preliminary Statement

This amicus brief filed by the Attorney General of the State of Florida pursuant to permission granted by the Court in its decision of May 17, 1954, in the above cases, contends that the Court should resolve its implementation decision in favor of the propositions stated in questions 4B and 5D.

The Court will find from a study of this brief that a sincere and thorough effort has been made by the Attorney General of Florida to present reasonable and logical answers to questions 4 and 5. These answers are respectfully submitted by way of assistance to the Court and are based upon a scientific survey of the factual situation in Florida, embracing practical, psychological, economic and sociological effects, as well as an exhaustive research of legal principles.

However, in filing this brief in answer to the hypothetical questions propounded, the Attorney General is not intervening in the cause nor is he authorized to submit the State of Florida as a direct party to the instant cases. Neither can his brief preclude the Florida legislature or the people of Florida from taking any legislative or constitutional action dealing with the segregation problem.

Part One

A discussion of the reasons for a period of gradual adjustment to desegregation to be permitted in Florida with broad powers of discretion vested in local school authorities to determine administrative procedures.

A. The Need For Time In Revising The State Legal Structure

There is a need for reasonable time and planning by State and local authorities in any revision of the existing legal structure of the State of Florida, (which now provides an administrative framework for the operation of a dual system of public schools) in order to provide a legal and administrative structure in which compliance with the Brown decision can be accomplished in an orderly manner.

Examples of Florida constitutional, statutory, and state school board regulatory provisions related directly or indirectly to segregated public schools are set forth in Appendix B.

The basic change which must be made if Florida is to comply with the non-segregation decision is either a repeal or revision of Article XII, Section 12, of the Florida Constitution, which provides:

> "White and colored; separate schools.—White and colored children shall not be taught in the same school, but impartial provision shall be made for both."

This provision in the basic law of Florida has been in existence since 1885. During the past 69 years it has been rigidly observed and has provided the foundation for an intricate segregated public school system, in accord with social customs which cannot be changed overnight without completely upsetting established school administrative procedure in school planning, transportation, teacher employment, capital outlay, districting, scholastic standards, public health, school discipline as well as many other facets of the tremendously complicated school structure in Florida.

Assuming that the basic law of Florida pertaining to a dual system of schools (Art. XII, Section 12, of the Florida Constitution) is rendered nugatory by the decision of this court in the Brown case, the Florida legislature must revise the entire School Code of Florida to the extent that the present code is predicated upon a dual system of education, and all administrative procedures which have developed under said code are grounded on the fundamental principle of a segregated system. A simple repeal of the various statutory and administrative procedures now provided for the operation of the school system (which may prove to be in conflict with the Brown decision) could only result in the creation of a vacuum in methods of school administration. The consequent immediate inrush of turbulent ideas into this vacuum without legal guidance or administrative regulation might well cause a tornado which would devastate the entire school system.

This system has grown through the years since the establishment of the "separate but equal" doctrine by the Court in the Plessy v. Ferguson case (163 U.S. 537), into a mammoth and intricate system of public education in Florida involving the annual expenditure of $138,895,123.15 and the welfare of 650,285 children. We do not believe that this system, which took over half a century to develop, can be transformed overnight.

The bare mechanical process of enacting legislation requires reasonable time for study by legislative committees, the time depending upon the complexity of the problem, and must conform to the legally established time for convening the legislature. On a problem of the magnitude of the one at issue, the study of legislative committees must be preceded by exhaustive study on the part of school officials and citizens' educational committees in order that the legislature may have the benefit of their recommendations.

I. EXAMPLES OF LEGISLATIVE PROBLEMS

(a) Scholarships

An example of the type of legislative problem which must be considered by school officials and the legislature is contained in Section 239.41, Florida Statutes.[1]

This law at present provides for 1,050 scholarships of $400 each year for students desiring to train for the teaching profession.[2]

According to the State Department of Education, awarding of the scholarships is done on a basis of county representation, race, and competitive test scores of psychological and scholastic aptitude. A compilation of the scores of the 740 white twelfth grade applicants in the Spring of 1954 yielded an average score of 340. Compilation of the 488 Negro twelfth grade applicants yielded an average score of 237. In the previous year, 1953, 664 white applicants made an average score of 342 while the Negro applicants made an average score of 237. This difference is classified as very significant, and should be interpreted as meaning that factors other than chance explain the different results between white and Negro scores.

In view of the wide divergence in achievement levels between the white and Negro races, as demonstrated by the scholarship examinations, and desiring to make these scholarship opportunities available to students of both races, it was recognized that provision would have to be made whereby Negro students would not have to compete against white students for these awards. Therefore, the legislature of Florida provided that the scholarships should be apportioned to white and Negro applicants according to the ratio of white and Negro population in the counties. Only in this way can Negro students in this state be assured of receiving a proportionate share of state scholarships awarded on the basis of competitive examinations.

1. See page 218, Appendix B.
2. See page 235, Appendix B.

If the Court's decision in the Brown case is to be interpreted that no distinction can be made on the basis of race in the operation of Florida's school system, it is apparent that Section 239.41, Florida Statutes, will have to be revised if the state is to continue its policy of encouraging Negro as well as white students to enter the teaching field.

It is apparent that the overall problem of teacher shortages cannot be solved immediately by law. It can be solved eventually by provisions such as Section 239.41, Florida Statutes, which is calculated to encourage a larger number of people to qualify themselves as teachers. If Section 239.41, Florida Statutes, is revised, however, to preclude immediately any recognition of a difference in scholastic achievement between Negro and white applicants for teacher scholarships, such revision would make it virtually impossible for the great majority of Negro students in Florida to receive scholarships, and from an economic standpoint they form the group of potential teachers who need such assistance most.

The problem can be solved, however, by time, without working an undue hardship on Negro students or creating an even greater shortage of teachers in Florida.

Dr. Gilbert Porter, Executive Secretary of Florida State Teachers Association had this to say on the subject in addressing a meeting of Negro teachers in Tallahassee on August 19, 1954:

BLEED THROUGH

"It is of no avail to blind ourselves to the marked difference in scholastic achievement between white and Negro students. This difference is not our fault, but it is there and must be recognized. If the doors to the state white universities were thrown open to Negro students today, it would make little difference because a great majority of Negro students could not pass an impartial entrance examination. We, as Negro teachers, can provide the only solution to this dilemma if given a reasonable amount of time, but it will mean an absolute dedication to his work on the part of every Negro teacher. Negro teachers can close the gap between Negro and white students if they will work hard enough. We have come a long way already in closing that gap and it can be closed completely within the foreseeable future if we will work hard enough. Any Negro teacher who is not willing to dedicate himself to this purpose should step out of the way because he is standing in the way of the progress of our race. Either we must remove this difference in scholastic standing or admit that we are inferior—and I will die and go to the hot place before I will ever admit that I am inferior."

Whatever is done by school officials and the Florida legislature to fit the Florida teacher scholarship act (Sec. 239.41, Florida Statutes) into the framework of the new concept of a non-segregated school system enunciated by the Court, should take into consideration the human rights and legal equities of members of the Negro race who would like to enter the one professional field which is now open to them on a large scale, and which they are now not only invited but urged to enter on a basis of absolute economic and professional equality. A strict legal application of the principle that no distinction can be made on the basis of race in public schools would necessarily have to ignore practical and human factors as they now exist which are of fundamental importance to the operation of a public school system in Florida. One thing is apparent. No equitable and workable solution can be found unless sufficient time is permitted by the Court in the application of its decree abolishing segregated schools, to allow for an abatement of the problems involved and an equitable adjustment by the school system to so drastic a change in its basic structure.

(b) Powers and Duties of County School Boards

The problems which will necessarily confront the Florida legislature in revising the provision of Section 230.23, Florida Statutes,[1] alone, are so involved and complicated if practical questions of school administration are to be considered, that no immediate solution is feasible.

Section 230.23, Florida Statutes, provides the powers and duties of county school boards and establishes a framework within which they may authorize schools to be located and maintained. It provides in part:

> "Authorize schools to be located and maintained in those communities in the county where they are needed to accommodate as far as practicable and without unnecessary expense all the youth who should be entitled to the facilities of such schools, separate schools to be provided for white and Negro children; and approve the area from which children are to attend each such schools, such area to be known as the attendance area for that school . . . "

Bearing in mind that this provision of the law has been followed throughout the development of the Florida school system and the location of schools decided in accord with its intent, a simple repeal of this provision would provide no systematic guide or formula for local school boards to follow in attempting to redesign and reorganize the dual system now in operation, which at present involves real estate estimated to be valued at $300,000,000 and a current building program now under way involving from $90,000,000 to $100,000,000,[1] into a single non-segregated system.

The conversion of this $300,000,000 school plant into a non-segregated system will clearly take a great deal of planning if the old primary factor of racial segregation is removed in school location, construction and operation.

The State Department of Education reports[2] that:

> "Florida provides annually $400 per instruction unit for Capital Outlay needs which for the 67 counties totaled $9,451,600 in 1953-54 and has been computed at $10,199,448 for the 1954-55 estimate. This money is spent in each county according to the needs recommended by a state-conducted school building survey. With the help of these individual county surveys it was estimated as of January, 1954 that $97,000,000 will be needed to provide facilities for white children and $50,000,000 will be needed to provide facilities for Negro children. Since the activation as of the effective date January 1, 1953 of a Constitutional Amendment providing for the issuance of revenue certificates by the State Board of Education against anticipated state Capital Outlay funds for the next thirty years more than $43,000,000 in state guaranteed bonds have been issued to provide additional facilities for both races. By the fall of 1954 there will have been a total of $70,000,000 of these bonds issued and in the foreseeable future the total will be $90,000,000 to $100,000,000. At the present time 2182 classrooms are under construction as a result of the issuance of these bonds."

The planning included in making necessary surveys, acquisition of sites, financing and engineering involved in the present construction program, although performed at top speed under the compulsion of a critical shortage of school buildings in Florida, is a continuing process and requires several years to carry out successfully.

Much of this school planning with regard to the allocation and use of existing structures as well as new construction will have to be re-evaluated and revised in accord with the entirely new and basic change to a non-segregated system.

These facts, when considered in the light of the overcrowded conditions now prevailing in many Florida schools, must be studied by the legislature and school officials in any effort to provide adequate administrative means of complying with the Court's decision. According to the State Department of Education, during the school year 1953-54, eighty-one schools in 18 Florida counties were forced to operate double sessions because of the lack of classroom space and trained teachers. In many instances to integrate immediately in particular schools would mean overcrowding of school facilities resulting in serious administrative problems too numerous to detail.

When these problems are further complicated by the drastic change in the legal framework of segregated schools in Florida, it is apparent that such factors should be recognized by the Court and sufficient time allowed for their orderly solution.

(c) State Board of Education and State Superintendent

A third example of the complex problems which will confront school officials and the Florida legislature in revising the framework of laws within which the school system can operate efficiently in compliance with the Brown decision is found in Sections 229.07,[1] 229.08,[2] Florida Statutes, relating to the authority and rule-making powers and duties of the State Board of Education; and Sections 229.16[3] and 229.17[4] relating to the duties of the State Superintendent of Public Instruction.

Although these provisions may not directly relate to segregated schools, they have in each instance been enacted and administered in accord with the basic provision of Florida law requiring a dual school system, and some revision will be necessary in the administrative powers granted therein in order to insure compliance with the Court's decree.

Specific problems in this regard are found in State Board Regulations adopted April 27, 1954 (page 154, State Board Regulations, page 219, Appendix B) related to the calculation of instruction units and salary allocations from the Foundation Program; State Board Regulation adopted March 21, 1950 (page 164, State Board Regulations, page 220, Appendix B), related to Administrative and Special Instructional Service; State Board Regulation adopted March 21, 1950 (page 171, State Board Regulations, page 221, Appendix B), related to units for supervisors of instruction; State Board Regulation adopted July 3, 1947 (page 28, State Board Regulations, page 226, Appendix B), related to School Advisory Committees; State Board Regulation adopted March 21, 1950 (page 148, State Board Regulations, page 228, Appendix B), related to the qualifications, duties and procedure for employment of supervisors of instruction; State Board Regulation adopted July 3, 1947 (page 156, State Board Regulations, page 232, Appendix B), related to isolated schools, State Board Regulation adopted July 21, 1953 (page 225, State Board Regulations, page 235, Appendix B), related to the distribution of general scholarships; State Board Regulation adopted July 3, 1947 (page 229, State Board Regulations, page 242, Appendix B), related to State Supervisory Services.

II. DISCUSSION OF LEGISLATIVE ATTITUDES

In setting out these examples of legislative problems which will require reasonable time for solution, we do not intend to imply that the members of the Florida legislature are at present willing to accept a desegregated school system. In fact, from such information as is now available on this point there is reason to believe that members of the Florida legislature are to a large extent unsympathetic to the Court's decision in the Brown case. A survey of leadership opinion regarding segregation in Florida conducted by the Attorney General included the following statement in the survey report (page 126, Appendix A):

> "Although the 79 members of the state legislature who returned questionnaires constitute almost 45% of the 176 legislators and legislative nominees, to whom the forms were sent, generalizations as to the entire membership of the legislature on the basis of their responses are entirely unwarranted. Any attempt to predict the action of the legislature at its next session would be even more presumptuous. The responses of these legislators to two special questions asked of them are presented below as a matter of interest, however.
>
> "The legislators were asked to indicate which of five possible courses of action should be followed at the next session of the legislature. The percentage checking each course, and the details of the five courses of action, are shown in Table 20 (Appendix A). The legislators were also asked whether they believed that there is any legal way to continue segregation in Florida schools indefinitely. Of the 79 respondents, 34.20% replied 'yes', 25.31% replied 'no' and 39.32% answered 'Don't know' or gave no answer."

Table 20, Appendix A, indicates that 40.5% of the members of the legislature who responded to the questionnaire wanted to preserve segregation indefinitely by whatever means possible.

BLEED THROUGH

It is even more significant that the Florida legislature in its 1951 session amended the appropriations act for the State Universities to provide that in the event Section 12 of Article 12 of the Florida Constitution shall be held unconstitutional by any court of competent jurisdiction or in the event the segregation of races as required by Section 12, Article 12 of the Florida Constitution should be disregarded, that no funds under the appropriations act shall be released to the Universities (page 683, Journal of the Florida House of Representatives, May 10, 1951). This amendment contained in Chapter 26859, General Laws of Florida, 1951, was vetoed by the Governor.

On the other hand, it is not our purpose to imply that the Florida legislature will refuse to take any action to provide a framework of laws designed to implement the Court's decision. Only the legislature itself under our form of government can determine what course of action it will pursue and we know of no way it can be coerced in making this determination except through the will of a majority of the people voiced through the ballot.

One thing seems apparent, however, under these circumstances. The Court upon equitable principles ought to extend to our legislature a reasonable period of forbearance during which the normal processes of legislative authority can be afforded time and opportunity to implement the Court's decision. The great multitude of problems the decision has created in the legal structure of our school system should warrant the Court in granting our legislature full opportunity to revise our school laws.

Such a period of forbearance is in keeping with the spirit of confidence which, under our system of democracy, is essential to maintain among the three branches of government. It is in keeping with the spirit of confidence which must be maintained between state governments and the Federation of States which has delegated to this Court its judicial authority. A fundamental precept in the practical workings of this spirit of confidence is the use of persuasion rather than coercion or compulsion. We believe that this Court will not attempt to use its powers of coercion precipitately and prematurely against any state whose legislature has not had time to revise its basic school laws to meet the requirements of transition.

Our Florida legislature under our Constitution does not convene again until April, 1955 for its biennial 60-day session.

Even at that session there may not be known the terms of the implementation pattern, since they are dependent upon whether the Court acts prior to April, 1955. Furthermore, whether the necessary spade-work and drafting of legislation to adequately provide for the transition can be accomplished within said session is largely a matter of conjecture, so multitudinous and complex are the problems.

We reiterate: the State, having so long relied on and lived under the Plessy doctrine, should have no unseemly haste visited upon its legislature in trying to meet the needs of transition, especially when it is considered by many to be, at best, a "bitter pill" for the legislature to swallow. Rather, the reasonable, considerate and tempered course would be to allow our legislature a requisite and ample period of time to study, debate and enact implementation legislation. This we believe the court from innate principles of equity will allow.

B. The Need For Time In Revising Administrative Procedures

In addition to the problem of statutory revision, the Court should consider the need for time in adjusting the literally thousands of administrative policies and regulations of local school boards and school superintendents which have been formulated within the framework of law to meet local conditions in each of the 67 counties of Florida which will have to be revised and reorganized to conform to new legislative enactments resulting from the Brown decision. It is apparent that considerable time must be allowed before workable administrative policies of this kind can be evolved. Speaking to a group of Negro leaders in Jacksonville on July 30, 1954, Florida State School Superintendent Thomas D. Bailey, said:

> "As I see it, the ultimate problem is to establish a policy and a program which will preserve the public school system by having the support of the people. No system of public education will endure for long without public support. No program of desegregation in our public schools can be effective, unless the people in each community are in agreement in attempting it."

School board members, school trustees and school superintendents are elective officials in Florida. They are obviously well aware that any administrative policies they adopt implementing state laws enacted pursuant to the Brown decision must meet with at least some degree of acceptance on the part of the people in the community if they are to prove workable.

I EXAMPLES

(a) Transportation

Perhaps the best example of this type of problem is the practical difficulties which will be encountered in converting the present dual school bus transportation system into a single system.

During the school year 1953-54 Florida's school system operated 2212 buses. These buses traveled 30,910,944 miles to transport 209,492 pupils at a cost of $4,506,667 (see page 186, Appendix A). These figures may be compared with Florida Greyhound Lines, the largest motor bus common carrier in Florida, which operates 175 buses in the state. A court order merging Florida Greyhound Lines with a competing line would necessarily allow a considerable period of time for revising routes and schedules to avoid duplication and insure maximum service to the public, but such a merger would be relatively uncomplicated compared to the problems involved in merging Florida's dual school bus system.

The problems of merging what amounts to two bus systems into one system without regard to race are obviously complicated. Hundreds of bus routes and schedules will have to be revised in line with the school redistricting which must take place. In accomplishing such a drastic revision of bus routes and schedules the paramount factor in school bus transportation, i.e., safety, must be considered at all times in the light of the fact that discipline among the passengers is directly related to safety. Discipline on school buses is maintained by one person, the driver. The ability of the driver to maintain discipline and a reasonable degree of safety while transporting mixed racial groups which may be antagonistic must clearly be considered in re-routing and re-scheduling school bus routes. Such consideration on the part of local school boards will require degrees of time in direct ratio to the complexity of the local situation in relation to the size and distribution of the Negro population and the intensity of opposition to desegregated schools on the part of the citizens.

(b) Redistricting

The redistricting of school attendance areas along normal geographic lines on the basis of a single school system rather than a dual system as it now exists is another problem which will require a great deal of time in proper planning and execution.

(c) Scholastic Standards

Perhaps an even greater problem which will confront school officials on both the state and county level is the maintenance of scholastic standards in the intermingling of two groups of students so widely divergent on the basis of achievement levels. According to the State Department of Education (see page 190, Appendix A):

> "A comparison of the performance of white and Negro high school seniors on a uniform placement-test battery given each spring in the high schools throughout the State of Florida is shown in Table 4, page 196, Appendix A. The number of participants corresponds with the total twelfth grade membership during the five-year period, 1949-1953. This table shows, for example, that on all five tests 59% of the Negroes rank no higher than the lowest 10% of the whites. On the general ability scale, the fifty percentile or mid-point on the white scale corresponds with the ninety-five percentile of the Negro scale. In other words, only 5% of the Negroes are above the mid-point of the white general ability level. Studies of grades at the University of Florida indicate that white high school seniors with placement test percentile ranks below fifty have less than a 50% likelihood of making satisfactory grades in college. While factors such as size of high school, adequacy of materials, economic level, and home environment are recognized as being contributing factors, no attempt is made here to analyze or measure the controlling factors."

In some large schools it is possible to divide students in the same age groups into different classes, taking into consideration their achievement level, but smaller schools do not have sufficient classroom space or teachers to make such a division possible. In the latter class of schools it is clear that an immediate and arbitrary intermingling of students falling into such widely divergent achievement level groups could only result in lowering the scholastic standards of the entire school and adding to the problems of discipline and instructional procedures. The Negro students would suffer if compelled to compete against white students of the same age but whose achievement level was 2 or 3 grades higher and the white students would be seriously retarded.

This problem is not insoluble and it is not advanced as a reason for permanent segregation in the schools. It is, however, a problem which must be taken into consideration by school officials in any attempt at integration of the races in the schools and it is a problem which will require careful planning, new techniques, and a great deal of time if it is to be solved without doing serious harm to both races and to the school system.

(d) Health and Moral Welfare

Still another example of school administrative problems in achieving an integrated school system is related to health and moral welfare. Writing in the Readers Digest, September, 1954, page 53, Mr. Hodding Carter, Editor and Publisher of the Delta Democrat Times, Greenville, Mississippi, said:

BLEED THROUGH

"If only because of economic inequalities, there is a wide cultural gap between Negro and white in the South, and especially in those states where dwell the most Negroes. These heavily Negro states are also largely agrarian. Among the rural and small-town Negroes, the rates of near-illiteracy, of communicable diseases, of minor and major crimes are far higher than among the whites. The rural Negro's living standards, though rising are still low, and he is still easy-going in his morals, as witness the five to ten times higher incidence of extramarital households and illegitimacy among Negroes than among whites in the South. The Southern mother doesn't see a vision of a clean scrubbed little Negro child about to embark on a great adventure. She sees a symbol of the cultural lags of which she is more than just statistically aware."

Specifically, with regard to Florida, the State Board of Health reports that during the year 1953 there was a total of 58,262 white births in the state, of which 1,111 were illegitimate. During this same period there was a total of 21,825 Negro births of which 5,249 were illegitimate. Percentagewise, this means that 1.9% of white births in Florida during 1953 were illegitimate and 24% of Negro births were illegitimate[1].

According to the State Board of Health there was a total of 11,459 cases of gonorrhea reported in Florida during 1953 of which 10,206 were among the Negro population.[2] We feel that this cultural gap should be honestly recognized by both white and Negro leaders as a problem requiring time for solution rather than an arbitrary and blind refusal to admit that it exists or that it is related to public school administration.

C. The Need For Time In Gaining Public Acceptance

There is a need for time in gaining public acceptance of desegregation because of the psychological and sociological effects of desegregation upon the community.

I. A SURVEY OF LEADERSHIP OPINION

A sincere and exhaustive effort has been made by the Attorney General of Florida to ascertain, as accurately as possible, the feelings of the people of Florida with regard to segregation in public schools. This survey was authorized by the Florida Cabinet which allocated $10,000 for the purpose. This effort was made primarily for the purpose of obtaining information which would be of use to the Court in formulating its final decree in the Brown case.

In making the survey and study, every possible precaution was taken to insure its impartiality and scientific accuracy. It was made with the advice and under the supervision of an interracial advisory committee composed of individuals chosen on the basis of their professional standing in the field of education; specialized knowledge which would be helpful in making such a study; reputation for civic-mindedness and impartiality and because they were willing to devote their time without pay in carrying out a task so enormous in scope in the brief time available. A more detailed explanation of the scientific methods and techniques employed in making this study is given with the complete survey report itself, which is made a part of this brief and included as Appendix A. The General Conclusions of this report are as follows:

II. GENERAL CONCLUSIONS

1. On the basis of data from all relevant sources included in this study, it is evident that in Florida white leadership opinion with reference to the Supreme Court's decision is far from being homogeneous. Approximately three-fourths of the white leaders polled disagree, in principle, with the decision. There are approximately 30% who violently disagree with the decision to the extent that they would refuse to cooperate with any move to end segregation or would actively oppose it. While the majority of white persons answering opposed the decision, it is also true that a large majority indicated they were willing to do what the courts and school officials decided.

2. A large majority of the Negro leaders acclaim the decision as being right.

3. Only a small minority of leaders of both races advocate immediate, complete desegregation. White leaders, if they accept the idea that segregation should be ended eventually, tend to advocate a very gradual, indefinite transition period, with a preparatory period of education. Negroes tend to advocate a gradual transition, but one beginning soon and lasting over a much shorter period of time.

4. There are definite variations between regions, counties, communities and sections of communities as to whether desegregation can be accomplished, even gradually, without conflict and public disorder. The analysis of trends in Negro registration and voting in primary elections, shows similar variations in the extent to which Negroes have availed themselves of the right to register and vote. At least some of these variations in voting behavior must be accounted for by white resistance to Negro political participation. This indicates that there are regional variations not only in racial attitudes but in overt action.

Regional, county and community variations in responses to questionnaires and interviews are sufficiently marked to suggest that in some communities desegregation could be undertaken now if local leaders so decided, but that in others widespread social disorder would result from immediate steps to end segregation. There would be problems, of course, in any area of the state, but these would be vastly greater in some areas than in others.

5. While a minority of both white and Negro leaders expect serious violence to occur if desegregation is attempted, there is a widespread lack of confidence in the ability of peace officers to maintain law and order if serious violence does start. This is especially true of the peace officers themselves, except in Dade County. This has important implications. While it is true that expressed attitudes are not necessarily predictive of actual behavior, there seems little doubt that there is a minority of whites who would actively and violently resist desegregation, especially immediate desegregation. It has been concluded from the analysis of experiences with desegregation in other areas, "A small minority may precipitate overt resistance or violent opposition to desegregation in spite of general acceptance or accommodation by the majority."[1]

6. Opposition of peace officers to desegregation, lack of confidence in their ability to maintain law and order in the face of violent resistance, and the existence of a positive relationship between these two opinions indicates that less than firm, positive action to prevent public disorder might be expected from many of the police, especially in some communities. Elected officials, county and school, also show a high degree of opposition. Yet it has been pointed out, again on the basis of experience in other states, that the accomplishment of efficient desegregation with a minimum of social disturbance depends upon:

A. A clear and unequivocal statement of policy by leaders with prestige and other authorities;
B. Firm enforcement of the changed policy by authorities and persistence in the execution of this policy in the face of initial resistance;
C. A willingness to deal with violations, attempted violations, and incitement to violations by a resort to the law and strong enforcement action;
D. A refusal of the authorities to resort to, engage in or tolerate subterfuges, gerrymandering or other devices for evading the principles and the fact of desegregation;
E. An appeal to the individuals concerned in terms of their religious principles of brotherhood and their acceptance of the American traditions of fair play and equal justice.

It may be concluded that the absence of a firm, enthusiastic public policy of making desegregation effective would create the type of situation in which attitudes would be most likely to be translated into action.[1]

7. In view of white feelings that immediate desegregation would not work and that to require it would constitute a negation of local autonomy, it may be postulated that the chances of developing firm official and, perhaps, public support for any program of desegregation would be maximized by a decree which would create the feeling that the Court recognizes local problems and will allow a gradual transition with some degree of local determination.

8. There is a strong likelihood that many white children would be withdrawn from public schools by their parents

1. Experience shows that where the steps listed above have been taken, predictions of serious social disturbances have not been borne out.

BLEED THROUGH

and sent to private schools. It seems logical, however, that this practice would be confined primarily to families in the higher income brackets. As a result, a form of socio-economic class segregation might be substituted for racial segregation in education.

9. It is evident that a vast area of misunderstanding as to each other's feelings about segregation exists between the races. White leaders believe Negroes to be much more satisfied with segregation than Negroes are and Negro leaders believe that whites are much more willing to accept desegregation gracefully than whites proved to be. Hence a logical first step towards implementing the principle set forth by the Court, and one suggested by both whites and Negroes, would seem to be the taking of positive, cooperative steps to bridge this gap and establish better understanding between the two groups.

10. Although relatively few Negro leaders and teachers show concern about the problem, white answers indicate that Negro teachers would encounter great difficulty in obtaining employment in mixed schools. To the extent that desegregation might proceed without parallel changes in attitudes towards the employment of Negro teachers in mixed schools, economic and professional hardships would be worked on the many Negro teachers of Florida.

11. Since 1940, and particularly since 1947, the State of Florida has made rapid and steady progress toward the elimination of disparities between white and Negro educational facilities as measured by such tangible factors as teacher salaries, current expenditure per pupil, teacher qualifications, and capital outlay expenditure per pupil.

12. In spite of the current ambiguity as to the future of dual, "separate but equal" school facilities the State is proceeding with an extensive program of construction of new school facilities for both white and Negro pupils, with a recommended capital outlay of $370 per Negro pupil and $210 per white pupil. Both this and the previous finding indicate that, while these steps have been taken within the framework of a dual educational system, there is a sincere desire and willingness on the part of the elected officials and the people of Florida to furnish equal education for all children.

13. Available achievement test scores of white and Negro high school seniors in Florida indicate that, at least in the upper grades, many Negro pupils placed in classrooms with white pupils would find themselves set apart not only by color but by the quality of their work. It is not implied that these differences in scores have an innate racial basis, but it seems likely that they stem from differences in economic and cultural background extending far beyond the walls of the segregated school, into areas of activity not covered by this decision.

14. Interracial meetings and cooperative activities already engaged in by teachers and school administrators in many counties demonstrate steps that can be, and are being taken voluntarily and through local choice to contribute to the development of greater harmony and understanding between whites and Negroes in Florida communities.

The specific findings of this survey regarding leadership opinion as expressed through mailed questionnaires are:

1. White groups differ greatly from each other in their attitudes towards the Court's decision, ranging from nearly unanimous disagreement to a slight predominance of favorable attitudes. (See Table 2, page 136, Appendix A)

2. White groups also differ from each other in willingness to comply with whatever courts and school boards decide to do regardless of their personal feelings. (See Table 4, page 139, Appendix A)

3. Peace officers are the white group most opposed to desegregation. (See Table 3, page 138, Appendix A)

BLEED THROUGH

4. Almost no whites believe that desegregation should be attempted immediately. (Table 2, page 136, Appendix A)

5. A large majority of both Negro groups are in agreement with the Court's decision declaring segregation unconstitutional. (Table 3, page 138, Appendix A)

6. While only a small minority of both Negro groups believe that desegregation should be attempted immediately, an even smaller minority would oppose attempts to bring about desegregation or refuse to cooperate. (Table 2, page 136, Appendix A)

7. Only a minority of whites in all groups believe that opponents of desegregation would resort to mob violence in trying to stop it. A larger proportion, but still a minority, believe that serious violence would result if desegregation were attempted in their community in the next few years. (Table 5, page 140, Appendix A)

8. A yet smaller minority of both of the Negro groups anticipate mob violence or serious violence as a result of steps towards desegregation. (Table 5, page 140, Appendix A)

9. The majority of all white groups are not sure that peace officers could cope with serious violence if it did occur in their communities, replying either "no" or "don't know" to the question. (Table 6, page 141, Appendix A)

10. A much smaller proportion of both Negro groups expresses doubt as to the ability of law enforcement officials to deal with serious violence. (Table 6, page 141, Appendix A)

11. The majority of most of the white groups believe that peace officers could maintain law and order if minor violence occurred. (Table 7, Appendix A)

12. The Negro groups did not differ greatly from the white groups in the proportion believing that police could cope with minor violence. (Table 7, Appendix A)

BLURRED COPY

13. Only 13.24 per cent of 1669 peace officers believe that most of the peace officers they know would enforce attendance laws for mixed schools.

14. A majority of the members of all white groups except peace officers, (who were not asked): radio station managers; and ministers, believe that most of the people of Florida and most of the white people in their communities disagree with the Court's decision. (Table 8, Appendix A)

15. In the five white groups asked, from one-fourth to one-half of the respondents believed that most of the Negroes in their community were opposed to the desegregation ruling. (Table 8, Appendix A)

16. A much smaller proportion of both Negro groups believe that most of the people of Florida, most of the whites in their community, and particularly the Negroes in their communities are in disagreement with the principle of desegregation. (Table 8, Appendix A)

17. Only a small minority of all groups, white and Negro believe that immediate assignment of children to schools on the basis of geographical location rather than race would be the most effective way of ending public school segregation. (Table 9, Appendix A)

18. All groups think a gradual program of desegregation would be most effective. Negroes, however, prefer that the process start within the next year or two with immediate, limited integration much more frequently than do whites. The whites prefer a very gradual transition with no specified time for action to begin. (Table 9, Appendix A)

19. Whites who expressed an opinion believe that the primary grades and the colleges are the levels on which desegregation could be initiated most easily. On the other hand, almost as many Negroes believed that segregation should be ended on most or all grade levels simultaneously as believed it should be ended first at the lowest and highest grade levels.

20. The maintenance of discipline in mixed classes by Negro teachers is regarded as a potential problem by a majority of white principals, supervisors and PTA leaders. A much smaller proportion of Negroes regarded this as a problem, with a majority of Negro principals believing that colored teachers could maintain discipline in mixed classes. (Table 11, Appendix A)

BLEED THROUGH

21. A majority of all white groups believe that white people would resist desegregation by withdrawing their children from the public schools, but a much smaller proportion of Negroes, less than a majority believe that this would happen. (Table 11, Appendix A)

22. Almost two-thirds of white school officials—superintendents, board members, and trustees—believe that application of Negroes to teach in mixed schools would be rejected. (Table 11, Appendix A)

It should be noted at this point that this opinion is supported by the experience of other states where desegregation of schools has already taken place. The August 27, 1954, issue of U. S. News and World Report, page 35, states, "In the north, protests from white parents tend to drive Negro teachers out of the schools to which their children go. The same thing is expected in the South when desegregation comes to the schools there. An illustration of what happens in the North is shown by the experience of Jeffersonville, Indiana. The town lies in the southern part of the State, just across the Ohio River from Kentucky. A great deal of Southern tradition and many Southern customs have reached across the river. Jeffersonville is just completing desegregation of its schools. There have been few unhappy incidents. But there has been a greater problem with teachers than with children in the schools. There were 16 Negro teachers in Jeffersonville when desegregation was started in 1948. By 1951 their number had dwindled to 11 as school enrollments were consolidated. For the school year starting in autumn, 1951, only three Negro teachers were retained. They had achieved permanent tenure under State law, and could be discharged only for cause."

BLURRED COPY

Florida now employs 19,848 persons in instructional positions not including supervisors. 4,721 of these teachers are Negroes. (Biennial Report, Superintendent of Public Instruction, State of Florida, 1950-51)

23. Nearly three-fourths of school officials believe that it would be difficult to get white teachers for mixed schools. (Table 11, Appendix A)

24. Almost half of school officials and a little over 40% of white PTA leaders believe that the people of their communities would not support taxes for desegregated schools, but only about 20% of Negro PTA leaders believe that such support would not be forthcoming. (Table 11, Appendix A)

25. In the case of all potential problems on which both Negroes and whites were questioned a smaller proportion of Negroes than of whites indicate belief that problems would arise as a result of desegregation. (Table 11, Appendix A)

26. In the case of peace officers there is a positive relationship between personal disagreement with the decision and lack of confidence in the ability of peace officers to cope with serious violence. There is an even higher positive relationship between belief that segregation should be kept and belief that peace officers would not enforce school attendance laws for mixed schools. (Table 12, Appendix A)

Regional Variations. The responses to certain items of the two largest groups polled, the peace officers and the white school principals and supervisors, were analyzed by region of the state in which the respondents lived. The 67 counties of Florida were grouped into 8 regions defined by social scientists at the Florida State University in "Florida Facts" (Tallahassee, Florida; School of Public Administration, The Florida State University).

Clear-cut regional variations in attitudes and opinions are found to exist, as is indicated by the following findings;

BLEED THROUGH

27. Although the majority of peace officers in all regions feel that segregation should be kept, the percentage feeling so varies from 83% in two regions to 100% in one region. (Table 14, Appendix A)

28. The percentage of white principals and supervisors who are in disagreement with the decision varies from 20% to 60% in different regions. (Table 15, Appendix A)

29. A large majority of white principals and supervisors in all regions indicate that they would comply with the decision regardless of personal feelings, but the percentage varies from 76% in Region VII to approximately 94% in Regions VI and VIII. (Table 16, Appendix A)

30. The percentage of peace officers predicting mob violence as a method of resisting desegregation varies from 20% in Region VIII to nearly 63% in Region VII (Table 17, Appendix A).

31. Percentages of both peace officers and white principals and supervisors predicting serious violence in the event desegregation is attempted vary widely between some regions (Table 18, Appendix A).

32. The majority of both peace officers and white principals and supervisors in all regions doubt that the police could maintain law and order if serious violence occurred, but there are some regional variations. (Table 19, Appendix A)

A Note on Responses of Legislators. Although the 79 members of the state legislature and legislative nominees who returned questionnaires constitute almost 45 per cent of the 176 legislators to whom the forms were sent, generalizations as to the entire membership of the legislature on the basis of their responses are entirely unwarranted. Any attempt to predict the action of the legislature at its next session would be even more presumptuous. The responses of these legislators to two special questions asked of them are presented below as a matter of interest, however.

BLURRED COPY

The legislators were asked to indicate which of five possible courses of action should be followed at the next session of the legislature. The percentage checking each course, and the details of the five courses of action, are shown in Table 20.

The legislators were also asked whether they believed that there is any legal way to continue segregation in Florida schools indefinitely. Of the 79 respondents, 34.20 per cent replied "Yes," 25.31 per cent replied "No," and 39.32 per cent answered "Don't Know," or gave no answer.

III. THE DADE COUNTY REPORT

A separate intensive study was made by the Attorney General's Advisory Committee under the immediate supervision and direction of a research team from the Department of Government of the University of Miami. This study was made of the greater Miami area and some outlying sections in neighboring counties in the belief that this part of Florida might have different problems of integration from other parts of the state due to its geographic location and density of population. The results of this study are included as a part of the overall project and set out in Appendix A.

IV. DISCUSSION

The implications found in the Florida survey are many and varied but it is significant that to a remarkable extent they verify and coincide with the conclusions and observations set forth in the book by Mr. Harry S. Ashmore, "The Negro and the Schools". The book is the result of an exhaustive research study sponsored by the Ford Foundation for the Advancement of Education of the problem of segregation in the south as the title implies.

BLEED THROUGH

For example, Mr. Ashmore states (page 81, "The Negro and the Schools):

> "The most important factor in integration of the public schools in the non-South, finally, is community attitudes. It is axiomatic that separate schools can be merged only with great difficulty, if at all, when a great majority of the citizens who support them are actively opposed to the move. (Italics supplied) No other public activity is so closely identified with local mores. Interest in the schools is universal, and it is an interest that directly involves not only the tax-payer but his family, and therefore his emotions. Those who are indifferent to all other community affairs tend to take a proprietary interest in the schools their children attend, or will attend, or have attended. State influence in public education has grown in recent years in proportion to the increase in state aid, but state policies rarely are so important as local forces in the shaping of public educational policies and practices. . . .
>
> "The most meticulous house-to-house poll in any American community with a sizeable Negro population would doubtless turn up a negative response to a proposal to integrate the separate public schools. In the case of the whites this might reflect deep-seated race prejudice, or it might be no more than the normal, instinctive resistance to any marked change in the accustomed patterns of everyday living. In many cases the basis of objection might be the demonstrable fact that the great majority of American Negroes are still slum-dwellers; many a parent who proudly considers himself wholly tolerant in racial matters will object to having his child associate with classmates of inferior economic and social background. It is probable that some resistance to integration would even be recorded among Negroes, who might respond negatively out of simple fear of the unknown, or the desire to protect their children against possible overt discrimination by white classmates or teachers. The great problem for schoolmen who have been moved to consider integration by their own convictions, or by the prodding of higher authority, has been to determine whether the passive resistance which they can readily sense will be translated into active resistance once the issue is drawn.

"In any event the superintendent who is called to take his school system from segregation to integration must be prepared to function as a 'social engineer' (Italics supplied). He will deal on a mass scale with delicate problems of human relationships involving not only pupils and teachers but the community at large.

"These case studies demonstrate that wherever there has been an active and well-planned program to 'sell' integration to the community at large it has succeeded —but here again there is no way to measure just how difficult the selling job really was. The most notable examples are to be found in New Jersey, where a well-staffed state agency made it its business to work closely with those communities which had long practiced segregation and appeared resistant to the change required by the new constitution. Although New Jersey's Division Against Discrimination was armed with the power to withhold state funds and even to bring misdemeanor charges against school officials who refused to comply, it accomplished the integration of 40 formerly segregated school districts without invoking these powers in a single instance...

"At the other end of the scale is Cairo, Illinois, where the effort of the NAACP to force a reluctant school board to accept the state ban on segregation led to violence. Cairo in almost every aspect of its community life, may be classified as a 'sick city,' and there is no indication of anything approximating an orderly interracial approach to the problem either before or after integration became an explosive issue.

"Between these two extremes lie most of the non-Southern cities. They are, for the most part, beyond the reach of any possible decision of the Supreme Court in the test cases, for segregation in the schools of the non-South is now rarely bolstered by law, and where it is it would hardly miss the legal prop if it were struck down. Desegregation is proceeding there at a rate determined by the willingness of individual communities to accept the change—or by the willingness of community leaders to put the issue to the test."

The same recognition of the problems involved in desegregation and the obvious need for adequate time to give local school administrators an opportunity to devise plans and means of overcoming the problems is found in the thinking of almost all authorities who have made a study of the subject.

In discussing the Problems of Desegregation, Dr. Truman M. Pierce, Professor of Education, George Peabody College for Teachers, and Director of the Cooperative Program in Educational Administration (Southern Region) had this to say (see page 91 Journal of Public Law, Emory University Law School, Vol. 3, Spring 1954, Number 1).

"People respond well, in general, to the opportunity of discussing with each other mutual concerns and interests. Controversial subjects discussed in the public arena under skillful leadership can often be resolved with a minimum of conflict. Effective public forums on the community level provide experiences in self-government which can hardly be surpassed in satisfactions which they bring and in progress they stimulate. However, questions tinged with a high degree of emotionalism offer ready-made opportunities for rabble rousers and self-seekers to do serious harm. Consequently, the calm, sane and relatively objective approach, which can be expected from most of the substantial citizens of the average community, is essential in the types of discussion suggested. It is hardly necessary to point out that such public forums should avoid emotional binges and concentrate on the study of facts. The third principle is that responsible and public spirited citizens of both races should discuss together the facts concerning their school system and together make plans for its improvement. This does not imply that the board of education should be by-passed, for final policy must be determined by this legally constituted body.

BLURRED COPY

> "Ill-advised and hasty action, determined without benefit of a period in which calm deliberation takes place (Italics supplied) can do more harm than good. Urgency need never take precedence over wisdom. Piecemeal and stopgap policies are likely to prove unsound and wasteful in the long run. Therefore, the final principle which is suggested is that extensive policy setting based on thorough study and careful thought should provide the framework for a thorough and comprehensive program of work extending as far into the future as is practical."

Dr. Howard W. Odum,[1] in discussing "An approach to diagnosis and direction of the problem of Negro segregation in the public schools of the South" says (Journal of Public Law, Emory University Law School, Vol. 3, Spring 1954, No. 1, page 34):

> "Final assumptions must rest upon continuing exploration, education, testing grounds for federal and state programs, and for a working balance between voluntaristic and coercive action. For, from special studies, general observations, and recorded experiences, it must be clear that all our exhibits of evidence appear as a sort of tug of war, now moving this way, now that. The real definition of the situation comes back again and again to inferences about issues, cultural values that are characteristic of the region, and to exploration and survey, projection of trends and predictions, and potentials that can be identified with alternatives. In this dilemma it would seem that never have the old classical, 'On the one hand and on the other,' and 'but also,' appeared to carry such a multitude of dichotomies, paired contradictions, major premises assumed, 'ands,' 'ors,' and 'buts,' in the loom of interaction processes. And rarely ever have we run across so many generalizations based upon so little basic research or tested observations. All of this is relevant not only to the elemental cataloguing of facts and the appraisal of causal factors, but to the orientation of value judgments and strategy priorities."

Everyone concerned in the State of Florida with the problems inherent in any attempt to desegregate schools, whether he be a member of the legislature or a school official cannot help but be aware that any change which is undertaken from the status quo must be made with at least the passive approval of the people in the community who will be affected by the change. Mr. Ashmore (The Negro and the Schools, page 135) states:

> "Finally, there is the hard fact that integration in a meaningful sense cannot be achieved by the mere physical presence of children of two races in a single classroom. No public school is isolated from the community that supports it, and if the very composition of its classes is subject to deep-seated and sustained public disapproval, it is hardly likely to foster the spirit of united effort essential to learning. Even those who are dedicated to the proposition that the common good demands the end of segregation in education cannot be unaware that if the transition produces martyrs they will be the young children who must bear the brunt of spiritual conflict."

D. Intangibles In Education

This Court has recognized the validity and significance of certain intangibles in education. Quoting from the Brown decision it said "In Sweatt v. Painter, supra, in finding that a segregated law school for Negroes could not provide them equal educational opportunities, this Court relied in large part on 'those qualities which are incapable of objective measurement but which make for greatness in a law school'.

"In McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, supra, the Court, in requiring that a Negro admitted to a white graduate school be treated like all other students, again resorted to intangible considerations: ' . . . his ability to study, to engage in discussions and exchange views with other students, and, in general, to learn his profession.'

"Such considerations apply with added force to children in grade and high schools. To separate them from others of similar age and qualifications solely because of their race generates a feeling of inferiority as to their status in the community that may affect their hearts and minds in a way unlikely ever to be undone."

The legislature of Florida was motivated by the same consideration of "intangibles" in education when it enacted Section 242.46, Florida Statutes. This law prohibits secret societies including fraternities and sororities in the public schools. The legislature and school officials recognized that in some instances fraternities generated feelings of snobbishness on the part of the members and feelings of inferiority on the part of those not invited to join. It was considered that these feelings might in the words of the court "affect their hearts and minds in a way unlikely ever to be undone."

We believe that this Court should recognize the validity and significance in education of other "intangible considerations" which may result from a precipitate attempt to compel desegregated schools in all areas of Florida. It is obvious that children reflect in their attitudes much of the same deep-seated prejudices and antagonisms felt by their parents. In the many areas of Florida where these feelings are known to exist no school administrator could compel an immediate desegregation without the certain knowledge that he was placing the children in a situation which could only result in generating feelings of hatred, inferiority and bias which would "affect their hearts and minds in a way unlikely ever to be undone."

E. Reason for Hope

There is some reason to believe that segregated schools can be ended in Florida in an equitable manner without destroying the school system itself. But there is no reason to believe that this can be accomplished hurriedly or through the legal coercion of school officials who would thus find themselves caught in the impossible dilemma of confronting on the one hand the irresistible force of a judicial edict which must be obeyed and on the other hand the immovable object of public opinion which cannot be altered. The only hope for a solution is for this Court to restrain the use of coercive measures where necessary until the hard core of public opinion has softened to the extent that there can be at least some measure of acceptance on the part of a majority of the people.

This recognition of the need for time and tact and wisdom in bringing about a true realization of the goal set by this Court, is shared by leaders of both the white and Negro races in Florida.

Dr. Mary McLeod Bethune, founder of Bethune-Cookman College at Daytona Beach, Florida, and a recognized leader of the Negro people throughout the nation for many years, stated in a press release soon after the announcement of this Court's decree in the Brown case:

> "... The High Tribunal has put a legal foundation under a belief many of us have long held and which is clearly and concisely stated in the most basic American ideal, 'All men are created equal.'

BLURRED COPY

"In quietness and patience, people of culture receive this news, realizing the inevitable has at last come about. They also realize, however, that the absorption into our daily life of this new decision—the putting of it into practice—must represent an organic cultural assimilation which, like all social processes, will take time. But eventually the wrongs and mistakes of history are righted and remedied and inhumanities are rectified. .... Let us enter into this integration calmly, with good judgment. Let us give and take, working out together the best possible means we can put into action so that there may be peace and understanding, and, may I say, the spirit of brotherhood.

"There is much for the Negro to do as well as the white. We must use tact and wisdom. It will take conferences, thinking and planning and working side by side. More largely than is realized, we are good, loyal, American citizens. And whether we be north, east, south or west, we shall put forth every effort to meet the requirements of our new status."

There is reason to believe that given the opportunity for voluntary local action and sufficient time an effort will be made on the part of educational leaders of both races in Florida to work together to achieve the goal set by the Court.

United States Senator Spessard L. Holland of Florida, speaking of desegregation, said in a press interview (Tampa Tribune, August 28, 1954, page 1):

"We cannot spend all our time in vain regrets, but rather time must be spent in trying, as apparently the State Cabinet has been doing along with officials and educators of both races at the local level, to learn how to bring it about."

On July 15 and 16, 1954, the Continuing Educational Council of Florida met in Tallahassee to consider the problem of desegregation. This Council is composed of representatives from virtually all civic, labor, veteran and educational organizations in the state. Seventy members of the Council were present at the Tallahassee meeting and the future course of Florida schools in the light of the Court's decision in the Brown case was discussed for two days. At the end of its deliberations the Council adopted the following motion:

> "Based on information and reports at this time, the Council joins with the request of the State Cabinet, heretofore made, whereby the Attorney General of Florida take every step necessary to prepare and file a brief which Florida and several other states have been invited to submit when consideration is given this October to the 'when' and 'how' provisions of the Court's judgment in the recent decision holding segregation unconstitutional. It now appears that this brief should emphasize among other things the following: 1. The maximum time possible should be granted the states affected. 2. Compliance with regard to time should be on a local basis; the time requirement because of mores and conditions will vary within counties of each state. 3. Enforcement provisions of the judgment's requirements should be left to the Courts of first instance."

Additional agreements which were reached by a large majority of the Council in discussion of the Supreme Court decision on segregation were as follows:

1. "The public school system of Florida should be maintained and improved. Nothing should be done which will destroy these schools or cause them to retrogress in any way."

2. "The citizens of Florida will wish to abide by the laws of our nation, but time for necessary adjustments is essential if serious problems are to be avoided."

3. "The problems of adjustment are different in each county and in various communities within each county. Responsibility for solution of these problems rests with the citizens and authorities within these local areas."

BLURRED COPY

4. "A committee from the Continuing Educational Council, with outside representation as well, is to be appointed. Its function is to suggest multiple plans by which desegregation may be implemented. Among the ideas developed would be the suggestion that local groups of white and Negro citizens make careful appraisal of existing conditions with the idea of proceeding gradually and in an orderly manner toward compliance with our National Constitution."

5. "A committee of nine representatives from the Continuing Educational Council is to meet with a representative group of State Negro leaders for the purpose of developing a joint statement to serve as a guide to both races in working out the problems ahead."

On July 30th, 1954, fifty representative Florida Negro leaders met at Edward Waters College in Jacksonville to study the problem of integration of Florida schools. As a result of this meeting a committee of nine was selected to meet with a similar committee of the Continuing Educational Council of Florida for the purpose of studying ways and means of implementing the Supreme Court's decision in Florida.

On September 10, 1954, a committee representing the Continuing Educational Council, and a committee representing the Leadership Conference, a recently convened meeting of Negro leaders, met in Tallahassee to consider jointly some of the problems posed by the recent Supreme Court decision that segregation in the public schools is unconstitutional.

After lengthy consideration and frank discussions of the various viewpoints of both whites and Negroes, the joint committees agreed upon the following motion:

"1. THAT, in a democratic society, public education is of paramount importance;

THAT the State of Florida has made significant gains

BLEED THROUGH

in recent years in the quality of its educational program and in the educational opportunities for all the youth of the State;

THAT the State of Florida cannot afford the educational or economic loss which would occur if we permitted a disruption of this program;

THEREFORE, we believe that we must maintain and support a strong system of public education for all the youths of the State and that the citizens of Florida in their local contacts, through constant education and study, should work for the general education of all the people as prescribed by the laws of our State and Nation.

2. THAT we endorse the filing of the proposed brief by the Attorney General for the purpose of preserving the system of public education in the State of Florida when a final interpretation has been rendered by the Supreme Court.

3. THAT we urge this Committee to continue to work on the processes necessary for ultimate compliance with the law;

THAT we encourage the organization of similar groups at the local level, i.e., school community by school community, to work toward the same objectives."

The motion was approved unanimously.

The Lakeland Ledger in an editorial August 29, 1954 said:

"In his annual speech to his home folk in Bartow on Friday, Senator Holland took occasion to talk about abolition of segregation in public schools...

"That attitude is the only one with which the problem now at hand can be solved, and it is the attitude of all clear thinking citizens in the South.

"If the process is not rushed, there will be a good chance of making the adjustment harmoniously over a period of years.

"If forces in the North that are unfamiliar with conditions in the South insist upon rushing matters, there is certain to be harmful friction.

BLURRED COPY

"The level-headed view such as that expressed by Senator Holland must prevail."

The Tampa Morning Tribune in an editorial August 26, 1954, said:

"In the brief which he is preparing to submit to the Supreme Court by October 1, Attorney General Ervin asks the court to go slow in ordering actual compliance with its edict of May 17 outlawing segregation. Mr. Ervin said:

'My purpose in filing the brief is to try to show the court that Florida, from practical considerations, is not ready for desegregation immediately, but that if it must come eventually, it should come only after a reasonable period of time and then only on a county to county or local basis pursuant to administrative determinations made by local school authorities. It is entirely possible that if the court will authorize this course many of the situations will not be too difficult to solve, given time to work them out.'

"That, in our view, is sound sense and should appeal to the judgment of the high court. It is apparent that a change in the existing order can be effected only through careful and patient effort, on a local basis. Also it may prove necessary to have action by the Florida Legislature to properly implement the change. The essential issue is the dividing line between federal and state authority."

The St. Petersburg Times of August 27, 1954, reported a speech by County School Superintendent Floyd Christian of Pinellas County to a meeting of Negro school teachers, as follows:

"Pinellas County Negro teachers were urged as leaders of the community 'to work patiently, calmly and sensibly' on the segregation problem so that all can continue working together for the growth of the community...

"We live under the law and must follow the law. Rioting, hatred and action would wreck our school system and is not the answer. Florida must never try to abolish public education. Turning the schools into private institutions is certainly not the answer. Any such action would prove disastrous to the quality of education and in the end would be judged by the Supreme Court as being an effort to circumvent the provisions of the Constitution of the United States.

"What I am saying is in my opinion Florida should not try to circumvent the law. Any such action would encourage an attitude of general disregard for law and in the long run will only increase the difficulties without contributing anything toward the solution of the problem...

"There is another reason why this problem will have to be approached with education and understanding. I don't believe that here in the South, where you have had separate schools for nearly a hundred years, that an immediate court decision to stop it and integrate the students can be done successfully. I don't believe you can legislate the people into doing this, they will have to be led by a systematic plan of education and this, of course, will take time."

The Ft. Myers News-Press in an editorial August 28, 1954, said:

"A number of Fort Myers citizens have received by mail this week circular letters purporting to come from the Ku Klux Klan which attempt to fan the flames of racial intolerance over the school segregation issue and make a bid for Klan recruits.

"The letters enclose an application blank for membership in the Klan returnable to an Orlando post office box. Whether they represent a bona fide recruiting drive by the Klan or just an effort of some crackpot or promoter trying to cash in on the current anxiety over prospective desegregation in the schools, the recipients have no way of knowing, although Orlando always has been a hotbed of Ku Kluxism and the application blank probably is genuine.

"There is nothing doubtful, however, about the hate literature enclosed with the KKK circulars. The fat envelopes—so bulky that most recipients had to pay an extra three cents postage due—were crammed with highly inflammatory articles against the Negro race and slanders against various public officials and individuals fit only for the sewer. In the delicate situation which now confronts both whites and Negroes arising from the Supreme Court anti-segregation ruling—a situation that calls for all the calmness and clear thinking that can be mustered—outpourings such as this are not only unhelpful but dangerous."

The Orlando Sentinel in an editorial August 19, 1954, said:

"As a result of a survey recently completed by an interracial committee appointed by the attorney general, it has been made perfectly clear that even in Florida many people of both groups are not ready to send their children to the same school together, and that law enforcement agencies are not prepared to enforce such laws or to prevent the violence which would arise under such circumstances.

"The problem varies from community to community just as it does from state to state and the difficulty increases in direct ratio to the number of Negroes present. It would be a relatively simple matter to enforce desegregation in a community where there would be only one or two Negroes in a classroom, as would be the case in most northern cities. It is not so simple where the numbers of the two races are more nearly equal.

"This happens to be the case in many of our smaller north and west Florida towns, as well as in most of the rural areas of South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama and Mississippi. In some Florida cities, however, particularly in South Florida, there are relatively few Negroes and the opposition to their admittance to white schools is not so prevalent.

"Clearly it would be unfair to expect public officials to overcome the problems of integration all at the same time without regard to the difficulties involved. The Supreme Court should take cognizance of the inherent differences among individuals as among communities and leave the problem of when desegregation can safely be accomplished to local authorities."

The Miami Herald in an editorial of May 24, 1954, said:

"Anticipating that the United States Supreme court might end segregation in the schools, as it did last week, Florida leaders have been quietly taking stock of the state's educational resources.

"They recognized that the change, when it came, would be the most momentous since the War Between the States, and no family would escape its effects.

"What this study showed was that Florida has made more progress in Negro education, probably, than any other state with segregation, and is in a better position to meet the challenge of the court ruling."

These meetings and examples of editorial opinion may appear insignificant but when considered in relation to the fact that they took place in a State which still has three counties where no Negroes have registered to vote (see page 178, Appendix A), and whose peace officers are overwhelmingly opposed to desegregation in any form (see Table 3, page 138, Appendix A), they should not be ignored. We believe that any attempt to compel an immediate desegregation in Florida schools would constitute a shock treatment so drastic that any further efforts on the part of these and similar groups would be promptly nullified. Such efforts on the part of citizens' committees of both races can only take place as voluntary manifestations of good citizenship. They cannot take place in an atmosphere of fear and coercion.

BLURRED COPY

F. Regional Variations

One of the most important factors which has emerged from our study of the segregation problem in Florida is the clear indication of marked regional variations in the intensity of the feelings of the people.

The State of Florida is unlike other Southern states in one significant respect. Geographically it is large and sprawled out over an area of a thousand miles extending from Pensacola in West Florida to Key West on the southernmost tip.

Between these two extremes can be found startling differences in the social customs and traditions of the people inhabiting the various counties.

Generally speaking, the influx of people from northern states has tended to settle in South Florida and this has altered to some extent the social pattern of South Florida counties, whereas North and West Florida counties have remained to a large extent populated by people of Florida or Southern ancestry who cling to Southern traditions and customs.

It must be emphasized, however, that this type of generalization is apt to be misleading because counties and communities may be found in South Florida where the degree of racial differences in feeling may be even more pronounced than in the northern part of the state.

These variations indicate that there may be communities in Florida where conditions are such that local school officials would feel justified in proceeding within a relatively short time to integrate the white and Negro schools. On the other hand, there are many counties, notably those having a large Negro population, where it is apparent that any attempt to bring about immediate desegregation would result in violence and bring the school system to a complete standstill.

These variations in community attitudes and conditions preclude the practicability of any overall, statewide detailed plan, time schedule or target date for desegregation which might be evolved. We believe that whatever plan and time schedule is adopted in each community must, if it is to be workable, have been produced through the efforts of the local school officials who understand the specific problems involved and who must be willing to undertake to make the plan work. We do not believe that the courts should undertake to perform the functions of local school boards and we do not believe that this Court should insist on a plan of action which, in its efforts to guard the rights of some, must necessarily forsake the rights of all others.

G. Discussion

In suggesting an affirmative answer to question 4B, we have attempted to take into consideration the wide range and complexity of the problem. We know that from its common-sense practical aspects a successful implementation requires the blending of the best administrative and judicial techniques over a reasonable period of time which will vary in each school district or county, dependent upon the circumstances. Admitted that segregation has been held unconstitutional as a class discrimination, that does not mean that transition to the actuality of non-segregated education can be accomplished immediately or without planning and preparation and administrative actions.

The public welfare of the segregated states is involved in the transition along with administrative details. It would be unwise not to permit the exercise of reasonable regulations under the police power during the transitional period in the interest of peace in the community and good order and safety in the schools. The white people of the segregated states have too long relied upon the doctrines expressed in Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U. S. 537, 16 S. Ct. 1138, 41 L. Ed. 256 (1896) to be expected to accept complacently the new order. Our survey amply bears this out.

Therefore, we most earnestly and sincerely urge the Court to permit that degree of latitude necessary to the segregated states and the county school boards therein to bring about an effective gradual adjustment to integration so as to soften and ameliorate the transition and preserve peace and order in the communities and the schools in the process and that these officials be accorded the discretion to make the transition successfully and effectively in good time and good order.

Even though it has been held the Negro child should not be discriminated against in his public education nor unduly postponed in his enjoyment of it, surely that right is not so absolute, so compelling in its nature, that reasonable administrative procedures necessary for the public welfare cannot be asserted during the transition period. If there ever was a condition which needs elasticity in the application of constitutional guaranties to meet it, certainly it is the transition period from the segregated school system to the non-segregated school system in the various schools of the South.

By a concurrent application of prudent and sensible administrative and judicial techniques the problem may eventually be solved. But the Court should always allow the states involved and their officials, both state and local, the opportunity to first work out the problem and accord to their determinations a wide degree of discretion and latitude in the integration. The Court has said in Minersville School District v. Gobitis, 310 U. S. 586, 60 S. Ct. 1010, 84 L. Ed. 1375, (1940), it would not make itself the school board of the country. That does not mean the Court, beginning with the court of first instance, would not always reserve the judicial authority to review and probe. It would exercise this authority where in proper cases duly brought it was alleged the county school board had not made the requisite effort in good faith to desegregate in line with appropriate criteria or factors which we believe the Court will outline in its implementation decision. Parenthetically and most earnestly, we urge the Court to accept the factors we have outlined, believing them to be essential to successful implementation in the light of problems involved.

Part Two

Specific Suggestions to the Court in Formulating a Decree

We do not suggest delay merely for the sake of delay itself. We do suggest that sufficient time be permitted for a gradual effective adjustment to desegregated schools to take place in each community.

The period of time required will vary in each community dependent upon its administrative problems and the attitude of its people. The length of this period of transition in each instance can only be determined by the local school authorities subject to the review of the courts of first instance when called upon to consider specific suits brought because of a disagreement with the school authorities over admission policies.

We do not believe that any court should at any time attempt to peremptorily compel school officials to integrate schools in a community when it is apparent that such action will create hostility and resentment to such a degree that the schools cannot be operated in an orderly manner.

We believe that any attempt to establish an overall specific plan for desegregation by the United States Supreme Court as a result of recommendations of a special master would be totally unrealistic and would in effect place this Court in the position of attempting to function as the county school board of the counties affected.

We believe that the courts of first instance should also avoid any attempt to exercise administrative powers normally delegated to school officials. They should not be required to spell out in specific detail the means by which they would require a school district to comply with the new requirements of the law. Rather, let them leave to responsible local school authorities the task of drafting plans for transition, and then apply to each such plan presented in the course of litigation the test of good faith.

Widespread white hostility to immediate, enforced integration of the public schools is a fact of life in Florida, and is just as real a factor in considering the future of public education as school finance, school construction or any other.

We ask only this; that school officials not be deprived of the right to recognize local factors related to the welfare of public schools and to exercise the same discretion in dealing with the feelings of the people regarding segregation that they would exercise in dealing with any other local condition or problem that directly affected the proper operation of the public schools.

We urge, therefore, that the Supreme Court remand these cases to the courts of first instance—in all but one of these cases federal district courts—and that it vest in the courts of first instance broad discretionary powers to determine as findings of fact (1) what should be a reasonable time for transition in any given case, and (2) whether or not specific plans for compliance with the Court's general directive prepared by responsible local school officials measure up to the broad test of good faith.

We offer the following specific suggestions for the consideration of the Court in the formulation of its decree:

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Specific Suggestions

I. It is suggested that the United States Supreme Court in its implementation decision or decree adopt the procedure contemplated in questions 4 (b) and 5 (d) as stated in the footnote in the Brown decision:

> "4 (b) may this Court, in the exercise of its equity powers, permit an effective gradual adjustment to be brought about from existing segregated systems to a system not based on color distinctions?"
>
> "5 (d) should this Court remand to the courts of first instance with directions to frame decrees in these cases, and if so, what general directions should the decrees of this Court include and what procedures should the courts of first instance follow in arriving at the specific terms of more detailed decrees?"

II. It is suggested that the United States Supreme Court in its implementation decision in the Brown case direct that the courts of first instance consider all suits brought to gain admittance to a specific school and claiming discrimination because of color, in accord with the following general directions:

A. The petitioner must affirmatively show;

(1) That admission to the school in question was requested by the petitioner within a reasonable time before the beginning of the school term.

(2) That the petitioner resides within the limits set by normal geographic school districting of the school he seeks to enter.

(3) That admission to said school was denied by the local school authorities and that all other administrative remedies such as appeal to the State Board of Education (where provided by law) have been exhausted.

B. It is suggested that the court of first instance conduct hearings, take testimony, determine the merits of the petition and the answer thereto and the equitable reasons which may exist which would justify the school authorities in refusing to approve the petitioner's application for admission to the school in question. In conducting such proceedings, the court should consider:

(1) Evidence as to whether the state school authorities and legislature have had a reasonable amount of time to reorganize the legal provisions of the state school structure to comply with the Brown decision.

(2) Evidence of good faith on the part of the school authorities in seeking to comply with the Brown decision and integrate the public schools. Such evidence should include:

(a) Efforts previously made and in progress to overcome practical, administrative problems encountered in integrating schools as proclaimed by this Court.

(b) Efforts previously made and in progress to promote citizens' educational committees and interracial committees for the purpose of improving racial relations in the community and avoiding racial antagonisms in the schools.

(3) Evidence and recommendations submitted by interracial citizens' committees which may be organized pursuant to law for the purpose of assisting the local school authorities, or evidence and recommendations submitted by impartial survey and fact-finding teams which may be created by the State Board of Education pursuant to its administrative powers.

(4) Evidence of existing administrative problems of integration which have not as yet been solved and which would jeopardize the efficient operation of the school system if the petitioner's application for admission was granted immediately.

BLEED THROUGH

(5) Evidence of such a strong degree of sincere opposition and sustained hostility on the part of the public to the granting of the petitioner's application, as to give the school authorities reasonable grounds to believe that immediate approval of the petitioner's application would cause a disruption of the school system or create emotional responses among the children which would seriously interfere with their education. Such evidence should be carefully analyzed by the court to determine its validity and all evidence of this nature which might appear to be simulated or fabricated for the purpose of continuing segregated schools in the community should be rejected.

(6) Evidence that the petitioner's application was made in good faith and not for capricious reasons. Such evidence should demonstrate:

(a) That the petitioner personally feels that he would be handicapped in his education, either because of lack of school plant facilities or psychological or sociological reasons if his application for admission is denied.

(b) That the petitioner is not motivated in his application solely by a desire for the advancement of a racial group on economic, social or political grounds, as distinguished from his personal legal right to equality in public school education as guaranteed by the 14th Amendment. This distinction should be carefully drawn. This Court has ruled that segregated schools are forbidden by the 14th Amendment because they may deprive the Negro of an equal opportunity in acquiring an education. During the process of desegregating schools it should always be kept in mind that the sole legal purpose of public schools is to educate. The public school system has never been permitted under Florida law to extend its activities into the field of public welfare or related purposes. It is not the purpose or within the legal authority of the Florida public school system to provide a direct means of improving the social, political or economic status of any group or individual except as such improvement may in time result from education itself. Public schools are not intended to provide experiments in race relations or to use children as sociological guinea pigs in the solution of problems in many walks of life which adults have not been able to solve by other means.

III. It is suggested that based upon the testimony and evidence submitted, the court of first instance may either:

(A) Order that the petitioner's application for admission to the school in question be granted forthwith, if it appears that the petition was made in good faith and that there exist no reasonable grounds for delay on the part of the school board in approving the petitioner's application for admission.

(B) Dismiss the petition if it appears that it was not made in good faith and well founded in law according to the interpretation of the 14th Amendment by this court in the Brown case.

(C) Order the school authorities to hold the petitioner's application in abeyance for a reasonable period of time to allow for further adjustment to a single school system if necessary, with directions to the school authorities to proceed to overcome as soon as possible the practical or psychological and sociological factors which prevent an immediate approval of the petitioner's application.

If the latter alternative is found to be necessary by the court it should include in its order the following:

(1) Fix a time for rehearing of the petitioner's application by the court within a stated reasonable time at which hearing additional testimony and evidence will be received and the circumstances justifying delay in approving the petitioner's application for admission will be re-evaluated by the court in the light of altered conditions and a supplemental order entered in the case in accord with the findings of the court.

BLEED THROUGH

(2) Direct the school authorities to formulate and submit to the court within a reasonable time a plan designed to overcome the practical and psychological obstacles which tend to prevent an immediate integration of the schools under their jurisdiction. The effectiveness of the plan submitted and the efforts which the school authorities have made in good faith to carry it out should be considered by the court on subsequent rehearing of the case in determining whether additional delay is justified in granting the petitioner's application for admission.

Legal Authority of the Court to Permit a Period of Gradual Adjustment and Broad Powers of Administrative Discretion on the Part of Local School Authorities.

A. Judicial Cases Permitting Time

Many decisions of the United States Supreme Court and the State Supreme Courts have recognized the necessity for granting a reasonable time in which to comply with the decree of the Court to avoid hardship or injury to public or private interests.

The present decision requires more consideration of the problem of time and adjustment than in the earlier cases since it is apparent that it involves a vast problem of human engineering, as contrasted to previous delays for adjustment granted in anti-trust cases, nuisance cases, and similar cases where economic problems of great magnitude confronted the courts.

I. United States v. American Tobacco Co., 221 U. S. 106, 31 S. Ct. 632, 55 L. Ed. 663 (1911). Recognizing the need for adjustment to its remedies in dealing with the unlawful combinations under the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, the Court, in order to avoid and mitigate possible injury to the interest of the general public, decreed the commercial combination to be illegal; and directed the Court below to hear the parties, ascertain, and determine a plan or method of dissolution, and to recreate a condition in harmony in law. To accomplish this, the Court granted a reasonable period (8 months) to effectuate its decree, while prohibiting any enlargement of the corporation's monopoly during this period.

Briefly stated, six months, with a possible extension of sixty days, was granted in which to work out a plan for dissolving a combination found to control the tobacco industry in violation of the Anti-Trust Act of July 2, 1890 (26 State at L. 209, Ch. 647, USC Title 15, s1), and creating out of the elements composing it a condition which would not be repugnant to the prohibitions of the Act.

II. In Standard Oil Co. v. U. S., 221 U.S. 1, 31 S. Ct. 502, 55 L. Ed. 619 (1910), the Court again recognized the need for time in putting into effect its decision. In this case Chief Justice White stated that the magnitude of the interests involved and their complexity required that six months be given in which to execute a decree for the dissolution of a holding company controlling the oil industry in violation of the Anti-Trust Act of July 2, 1890, and for the transfer back to the stockholders of the subsidiary corporations of the stock which had been turned over to the holding company in exchange for its own stock.

In the area of nuisance litigation, the Supreme Court has often recognized the need for a period of gradual transition in order to effectuate decisions. In the Case of New Jersey v. New York, 283 U. S. 473, 75 L. Ed. 1176, 51 S. Ct. 519, (1931), the State of New Jersey sued New York City in the United States Supreme Court for an injunction restricting the dumping of New York City's garbage into the ocean off the New Jersey coast. Injunction was granted in the opinion by Butler, J., affirming a special master's report. A decree was entered, declaring that the plaintiff State of New Jersey was entitled to an injunction as sought in the complaint; but that before (italics supplied) an injunction was issued, a reasonable time would be accorded to the defendant, within which to carry into effect its proposed plan for the erection and operation of incinerators to destroy the waste materials which were being dumped off the New Jersey coast, or to provide other means to be approved by the decree for the disposal of such materials.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

Reasonable time was a question of fact to be decided upon by the same special master, after hearing and evaluating all witnesses' testimonies from each party or witnesses which the master may select to be heard. The master was then to report to the court his findings and a form of decree. On a rehearing of the case on December 7, 1931, (284 U. S. 585, 75 L. Ed. 506, 52 S. Ct. 120) a decree was entered by the Supreme Court prohibiting any further dumping of refuse, etc., into the ocean off the coast of New Jersey. Said decree was to become effective on and after June 1, 1933, and progress reports were to be filed with the clerk of the Supreme Court on April 1 and October 1 of each year beginning April 1, 1932, setting forth the progress made in the construction of incinerator plants, etc., for the final disposition of garbage and refuse, and also the amount of material dumped at sea during the periods covered by such reports.

Provision was also made in the decree that upon the receipt of said reports, and on due notice to the other party, either party to the suit could apply to the Court for such action or relief with respect to the time allowed for the construction, or method of operation of the proposed incinerator plants, or other means of final disposition of garbage, etc., as may be deemed appropriate. In other words, the flexibility of the decree permitted frequent re-evaluation to promote the greatest justice to all parties.

On May 29, 1933 (289 U. S. 712) Mr. Chief Justice Hughes announced a new order, based on the failure of New York City to comply with the decree of December 7, 1931. The defendant asked that the time for taking effect of the injunction be extended from June 1, 1933 to April 1, 1934. It was ordered that these applications be heard on November 6, 1933, that E. K. Cambell be appointed Special Master, empowered to hear witnesses, issue subpoenas, take evidence offered by interested parties, and also such as he may deem necessary to show:

(A) What shall have been done by defendant city, up to September 15, 1933, and the time reasonably required to enable it to comply with the decree.

(B) The amounts spent by the plaintiff New Jersey to prevent harm to its beaches, waters, etc., subsequent to June 1, 1933, and the damages sustained by them as a result of New York's failure to comply with the decree.

The Special Master's findings were subject to consideration, revision, or approval by the Court.

On December 9, 1935 (296 U.S. 259, 80 L. Ed. 214, 56 S. Ct. 188), Mr. Justice Butler announced a new decree modifying in effect the decree of December 4, 1933. The latter decree enjoined New York City from dumping refuse off the New Jersey coast, stipulating a five thousand dollars ($5,000.00) a day penalty for failure to comply. On October 7, 1935, New York City sought a modification of the decree, and asked for a petition to have New Jersey show cause why a ruling could not be made to the effect that ten miles (10) off shore dumping is satisfactory as to non-floating material, or, in the alternative, why the Court should not modify its decree so as to permit the defendant to dump non-floating sewage as aforesaid.

Defendant's motion for leave to file was granted.

It should be noted that the original decree was handed down in 1931 and continued modification took place for some four (4) years in order to effectuate the original decree. Recognition for additional time was given each time the case reappeared before the Court.

III. The Supreme Court again recognized the need for a calm period of gradual transition to effectuate its decree, in the Gaseous Nuisance Cases in which it took some nine (9) years to implement its decrees.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The first case was that of Georgia v. Tennessee Copper Co., 206 U.S. 230, 51 L. Ed. 1038, 27 S. Ct. 618 (1907). In this case the State of Georgia sought to enjoin the defendant copper companies from discharging noxious gases from their works in Tennessee over the plaintiff's territory. The State alleged that such discharges were destroying entire forest, orchard, and crop lands, and that irreparable injuries were being done and threatened in five counties of Georgia. A preliminary injunction was denied, but, as there were grounds to fear that great and irreparable damage might be done, an early day was fixed for the final hearing, and the parties were given leave, if so minded, to try the cases on affidavits. Mr. Justice Holmes held that if the State of Georgia adhered to its determination, there was no alternative to issuing an injunction, after allowing a reasonable time for the defendants to complete the structures then being built, and efforts the companies were making to stop the flow of fumes and gases into Georgia. The plaintiff Georgia was permitted to submit a form of decree on the coming in of the Court in the following October.

Eight (8) years later, on May 10, 1915, the Supreme Court again heard the same case, in the State of Georgia v. Tennessee Copper Co. and Ducktown Sulphur, Copper, & Iron Co., Ltd., 237 U.S. 474, 59 L. Ed. 1054, 35 S. Ct. 631 (1915).

This case is a continuation of the earlier one, supra (1907), in regard to the nuisance of gaseous fumes harming the property within the State of Georgia. In the earlier case, hope was entertained that some practical method of subduing the noxious fumes could be devised and by consent, the time for entering a final decree was enlarged. Both companies installed purifying devices. The original defendant, Tennessee Copper and Georgia, entered into a stipulation whereby the former undertook annually to supply a fund to compensate those injured by fumes from its works, to conduct its plant subject to inspection in specified ways, and between April 10 and October 1, not to "operate more green ore furnaces than it finds necessary to permit of operating its sulphuric acid plant at its normal full capacity." The State of Georgia agreed to refrain from asking for an injunction prior to October, 1916, if the stipulation was fully observed. Ducktown Company and the State were unable to agree, and in February, 1914, the latter moved for a decree according a perpetual injunction. Consideration of the matter was postponed upon representation that conditions had materially changed since 1907, and leave was granted to present additional testimony "to relate solely to the changed conditions," if any, which may have arisen since the case was then decided. A decree was granted restraining the Ducktown Company from continuing to operate its plant other than upon the terms and conditions set out by the Court (Decree set forth in 237 U.S. 678, 59 L. Ed. 1173, 35 S. Ct. 752 (1915)).

A new decree was issued April 3, 1916 in 240 U. S. 650, 60 L. Ed. 846, 36 S. Ct. 465, (1916). This decree modified the former decrees as to the escapement of fumes, as to records to be kept in regard thereto, and also as to expense of inspection and division of costs.

The three(3) cases, dealing with the problem of escaping nuisances, cover a span of nine (9) years (from 1907 to 1916). It illustrates how long a period is required to adjust to incorporeal changes and strongly suggests that human changes obviously require greater periods, since human emotions are not as easily controlled as are gaseous materials from sulphur and copper plants. Recognition of the need of calm planning in good faith to reconcile difficult problems has often been illustrated by the Court in contexts of economic and social changes as a result of its decisions.

IV. In People of the State of New York v. State of New Jersey and Passaic Valley Sewerage Commissioners, 256 U.S. 296, 65 L. Ed. 937, 41 S. Ct. 492 (1921), at page 313, Mr. Justice Clarke, in refusing to grant injunction relief against the operation of sewerage disposal by New Jersey into New York Harbor, wisely stated:

> "We cannot withhold the suggestion, inspired by the consideration of this case, that the grave problem of sewage disposal presented by the large and growing populations living on the shores of New York Bay is one more likely to be wisely solved by cooperative study and by conference and mutual concession on the part of Representatives of the States so vitally interested in it than by proceedings in any Court however constituted."

This quotation strongly suggests the need for time to work out these difficult intangible relations, in an atmosphere of cooperation and reason, rather than a tremendous disruption of social and economic conditions.

V. In the case of Martin Bldg. Co. v. Imperial Laundry Co., 220 Ala. 90, 124 So. 82, the Supreme Court of Alabama recognized the need for time in the use of injunctive relief. In a suit by the owner of an office building to enjoin a laundry from emitting smoke over the complainant's premises, the basis of the suit was the discomfort to the building's tenants, endangering of their health, and the resulting loss of tenants. The question of the abatement of the nuisance by improved technological laundry methods had to be further considered before the Court would grant or refuse injunctive relief, in view of suggested means of reducing amount of smoke by use of stokers. This acted to delay the force of the injunctive relief sought.

B. Administrative Discretion Cases

The use of administrative discretion and its limits have often been spelled out by the Court in the areas of administrative agencies. The Court has consistently emphasized that supervision and discretion should lie with the administrative agencies in the conducting of their functons as economic and political governing boards. Such emphasis is closely related to the administrative discretion which should exist in school boards, also.

I. In United States v. Paramount Pictures, 334 U. S. 131, 92 L. Ed. 1260, 68 S. Ct. 915, (1948), Mr. Justice Douglas reviewed a decree in an injunction suit by the United States under the Sherman Act to eliminate or qualify certain business practices in the motion picture industry. A provision in the decree that films be licensed on a competitive bidding basis was eliminated by the Supreme Court as not likely to bring about the desired end as involving too much judicial supervision to make it effective. This elimination was held to require reconsideration by the district court of its prohibition of the expansion of theatre holdings by distributors and provisions for divesting existing holdings. The propriety of including in the decree a provision for voluntary arbitration of questions arising thereunder was indicated, and denial of applications for leave to intervene by persons challenging the eliminated provision for competitive bidding was upheld.

Mr. Justice Douglas was strongly opposed to the judiciary administrating industry, and favored voluntary arbitration: At page 163 he stated:

> "It would involve the judiciary in the administration of intricate and detailed rules governing priority, period of clearance, length of run, competitive areas, reasonable return and the like. The system would be apt to require as close a supervision as a continuous receivership, unless the defendants were to be entrusted with vast discretion. The judiciary is unsuited to affairs of business management; and control through the power of contempt is crude and clumsy and lacking in the flexibility necessary to make continuous and detailed supervision effective."

The implications of Mr. Justice Douglas's opposition to judicial administration of intricate and detailed rules in the economic field could readily apply to the social relationship and problems created by the recent holding in the Brown case.

II. Further evidence of the broad discretion that was permitted by the Supreme Court in administrative agencies is evidenced in the case of Alabama Public Service Commission v. Southern Railway Company, 341 U. S. 341, 95 L. Ed. 1002, 71 S. Ct. 762, (1951). A railroad, prohibited by state law from discontinuing trains without permission of the state public service commission was denied such permission on the ground that though the trains were being operated at a loss there was a public need for the service. Alleging that irreparable loss would result either from continued operation of the trains or from incurring the penalty imposed by state law for discontinuance without the commission's permission, the railroad sought and obtained an injunction in a federal district court against the enforcement of the statute.

The U. S. Supreme Court, through Chief Justice Vinson, reversed the district court, and held that the federal court's exercise of such jurisdiction should, on considerations of comity, be withheld on the ground that the state law provided for review of the commission's order in the state courts and for its stay pending such review.

BLEED THROUGH

Some persuasive language in support of state administrative discretion appears at pages 347-348:

> "The Alabama Commission, after a hearing held in the area served, found a public need for the service. The court below, hearing evidence de novo, found that no public necessity exists in view of the increased use and availability of motor transportation. We do not attempt to resolve these inconsistent findings of fact. We take note, however, of the fact that a federal court has been asked to intervene in resolving the essentially local problem of balancing the loss to the railroad from continued operation of trains . . . with public need for that service . . . directly affected. . . ." (Italics supplied).

More support to the finality of the discretion of the commission is found on page 348:

> " . . . and whatever the scope of review of commission findings when an alleged denial of constitutional rights is in issue, it is now settled that a utility has no right to relitigate factual questions on the ground that constitutional rights are involved. New York v. United States, 331 U.S. 284, 334-336 (1947). . . ." (Italics supplied)

More directly in point, at pages 349-350 is found the following:

> " . . . as adequate state court review of an administrative order based upon predominantly local factors is available to appellee intervention of a federal court is not necessary for the protection of federal rights. Equitable relief may be granted, only when the District Court, in its sound discretion exercised with the 'scrupulous regard for the rightful independence of state governments which should at all times actuate the federal courts,' is convinced that the asserted federal right cannot be preserved except by granting the 'extraordinary relief of an injunction in the federal courts.' Considering that 'few public interests have a higher claim upon the discretion of a federal chancellor than the avoidance of needless friction with state policies,' the usual rule of comity must govern the exercise of equitable jurisdiction by the District Court in this case...." (Italics supplied)

And again at page 351, "It is in the public interest that federal courts of equity should exercise their discretionary power to grant or withhold relief so as to avoid needless obstruction of the domestic policy of the states...."

III. Further evidence of the broad discretion permitted by the Supreme Court to state administrative agencies is found in the case of Burford v. Sun Oil Co., 319 U. S. 315, 87 L. Ed. 1424, 63 S. Ct. 1098 (1943). In this case the Sun Oil Co. attacked the validity of an order of the Texas Railroad Commission granting the petitioner Burford a permit to drill oil wells on a small plot of land in the East Texas oil fields. The U. S. District Court for the western district of Texas dismissed the suit by the Company; the Circuit Court of Appeals reversed the District Court. The Supreme Court through Mr. Justice Black reversed the Circuit Court of Appeals, and affirmed the District Court.

The Supreme Court held that a federal equity court may properly decline to exercise its jurisdiction invoked because of diversity of citizenship of the parties and alleged infringement of constitutional rights; to determine the validity of a state commission order, made under the authority of a conservation statute, granting a permit to drill oil wells on certain property, adjacent to lands owned by the complainant, where the state has provided a uniform method for the formation of policy and determination of cases by the commission and the state courts; and where the judicial review of the commission's decisions in the state courts is expeditious and adequate; and where intervention by the lower federal courts is likely to cause delay and conflicting interpretation of the state law, dangerous to the success of state domestic policies.

BLEED THROUGH

The Court, at page 320, explicitly states:

> "The primary task of attempting adjustment of these diverse interests is delegated to the Railroad Commission, which Texas has vested with 'broad discretion' in administering the law."

The Court points out that the Texas courts have the power of thorough judicial review of the decisions of the Railroad Commisson; and that the Texas courts are working partners with the Commission in the business of creating a regulatory system for the oil industry. The Commission is charged with principal responsibility for fact finding and for policy making and the courts expressly disclaim the administrative responsibility. On the other hand, orders of the Commission are tested for "reasonableness" by trial de novo before the state court, and the Court may on occasion make a careful analysis of all the facts of the case in reversing a Commission order. The state court may even formulate new standards for the Commission's administrative practice, and suggest that the Commission adopt them.

The Supreme Court recognized that the existence of problems throughout the oil regulatory field creates a possibility of serious delay which can injure the conservation program; and that it may be necessary to stay federal action pending authoritative determination of difficult state questions. It recognized that questions of state regulation of the oil industry so clearly involve basic problems of Texas policy that equitable discretion should be exercised to give the Texas courts the first opportunity to consider them.

IV Concrete evidence of the Supreme Court's adherence to complete administrative discretion is found in the case of Far Eastern Conference, United States Lines Co., States Marine Corporation, et al. v. United States and Federal Maritime Board, 342, U. S. 570, 96 L. Ed. 576, 72 S. Ct. 492 (1952). The suit was brought by the government to enjoin the dual rate system established by an association of steamship companies known as the Far East Conference. The companies never submitted the rates to the Federal Maritime Board for approval, as provided for in §15 of the Shipping Act (46 USC §814). The defense, that the issues involved were of such a technical nature calling for the application of administrative exercise as to make it improper to bypass the Board, was upheld by the Court through Justice Frankfurter.

It was held that the administrative agencies should not be bypassed by the Courts in cases raising issues of fact not within the conventional experiences of judges or in cases requiring the exercise of administrative discretion, even though the facts, after they have been appraised by specialized competence, serve as a premise for legal consequences to be judicially defined.

V. "But the courtroom is not the arena for debating issues of educational policy. It is not our province to choose among competing considerations in the subtle process of securing effective loyalty to the traditional ideals of democracy, while respecting at the same time individual idiosyncrasies among a people so diversified in social origins and religious alliances. So to hold would in effect make us the school board for the country." Minersville School District v. Gobitis, 310 U.S. 586, 60 S. Ct. 1010, 84 L. Ed. 1375 (1940), at 310 U. S. 598 (Italics supplied).

Parenthetically, the Court, in this case recognizes its limitations in the abstract sciences, with this language at page 597:

> "The precise issue, then, for us to decide is whether the legislatures of the various states and the authorities in a thousand counties and school districts of this country are barred from determining the appropriateness of various means to evoke that unifying sentiment without which there can ultimately be no liberties, civil or religious. To stigmatize legislative judgment in providing for this universal gesture of respect for the symbol of our national life in the setting of the common school as a lawless inroad on that freedom of conscience which the Constitution protects, would amount to no less than the pronouncement of pedagogical and psychological dogma in a field where courts possess no marked and certainly no controlling competence."

Constitutional guarantees of personal liberty are not always absolutes. Government has the right to maintain public safety and good order.

Keeping the control of public education close to the local people is perhaps the strongest tradition in American education. One of the predominant characteristics of American education is the variation in local policies and procedures in terms of unique local conditions. This is in sharp contrast to the highly centralized national system of education of other countries.

VI. "Civil liberties, as guaranteed by the Constitution, imply the existence of an organized society maintaining public order without which liberty itself would be lost in the excesses of unrestrained abuses." Cox v. New Hampshire, 312 U. S. 569, 61 S. Ct. 762, 85 L. Ed. 1049 (1941) at 312 U. S. 574.

VII. Speaking of the 14th Amendment, the U. S. Supreme Court in Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 5 S. Ct. 357, 28 L. Ed. 923 (1885), said at page 31:

> "But neither the amendment—broad and comprehensive as it is—nor any other amendment, was designed to interfere with the power of the State, sometimes termed its police power, to prescribe regulations to promote the health, peace, morals, education and good order of the people..." (Italics supplied)

VIII. In Euclid v. Ambler Realty Co., 272 U. S. 365, 47 S. Ct. 114, 71 L. Ed. 303 (1926), it said at page 387:

> "Regulations, the wisdom, necessity, and validity of which, as applied to existing conditions, are so apparent that they are now uniformly sustained, a century ago, or even a half century ago, probably would have been rejected as arbitrary or oppressive . . . while the meaning of constitutional guaranties never varies, the scope of their application must expand or contract to meet new and different conditions which are constantly coming within the field of their operation . . . Laws and regulations must find their justification in some aspect of the police power, asserted for the public welfare."

C. Remarks

The aforesaid summary shows the wise recognition by the Supreme Court in the past of the need for time in effecting certain economic changes in our society in order to allow a period of healthy adjustment in sensitive areas. The cases also show a recognition of the need for adequate local discretion in the same areas. This line of reasoning should be applied to the even more sensitive area of desegregation which presents a vast problem of human engineering to resolve the social changes sought.

Samuel Gompers, one of America's greatest labor leaders recognized this fact some years ago when he stated:

> "One fact stands out in bold relief in history of men's attempts for betterment. That is that when compulsion is used, only resentment is aroused, and in the end nothing is gained. Only through moral suasion and appeal to men's reason can a movement succeed."

Part Four

Considerations Involved in Formulating Plans For Desegregation

NO PAGE NUMBER

A. Changes in the Law

Dr. Rupert B. Vance, Professor of Sociology, University of North Carolina, past president of the American Sociological Society, writing in the Journal of Public Law, Emory University Law School, Vol. 3, Spring 1954, Number 1, page 42, says:

> "National prohibition offers an example of a change in law which did not carry through to change in the collective behavior and attitudes of society. In spite of our respect for the Constitution, resistance increased and law enforcement was insufficient to bring about social change. This resistance assumed the form of violations, as well as evasions, of the law. Under this situation it can be said that the 18th Amendment was repealed in order to preserve respect for the law. This occurred in spite of the fact that the initial change had the support of public opinion as represented in the (1) affirmative vote of legislatures of the states, and was implemented both by (2) federal legislation, as in the Volstead Act, and (3) supporting legislation in many states. For students of social change, the contrast with a decision of the Supreme Court is impressive.
>
> "Thus, while students of law realize that social change can be and has been implemented by legal enactment and judicial decision, it is also realized that resistance to social change is of many types. Here we can say that jurisprudence, as a social science, has shared in the responsibility of determining the extent to which any desired social change is enforceable by law. Laws may be violated, and they may be evaded. Evasion carries the implication of driving a course through gaps in the law, if not actually breaking it. Important to the courts, to public order, and to the profession is the whole field of conflict of laws. Oftentimes, the change ordered by legal enactment and judicial decision is so limited in scope that no actual evasion is drawn upon to block social change. Some times modes of adjustment may exist within the choice of individuals and groups—alternatives sanctioned in legal codes. It is in this borderline between public and private spheres of life that the doctrine of social change is of most importance to students of jurisprudence. It must be remembered that issues will be decided, not on the basis of an assumed code of ethics, but on the basis of what is enforceable within the system of legality." (Italics supplied)

B. Plans for Integration

The problem involves, among other things, the collective conscience or mores of our white citizens regarding segregation. That conscience simply stated, although of varying degrees of intensity, is that our people are not ready for desegregation. This was demonstrated conclusively by the survey which was made in Florida. This conscience is ingrained because it was nurtured and cherished throughout many generations as a way of life. It is deep-seated and its roots rest in fears of inter-marriage of the races, racial differences, superstitions, history, traditions and customs.

This community conscience until the Brown case had long years of legal sanction in the field of public education. Elimination of this legal sanction by no means eradicates the underlying collective conscience of the people in this field. This attribute of the problem simply cannot be successfully solved overnight.

This the Court undoubtedly appreciated by not making its desegregation decision immediately effective. Its questions and its delay of implementation indicate that it is conscious of what may be termed the equities of transition. The Court, we believe, is imbued with the need for gravity and for prudent concern in dealing with this collective conscience.

We think it realizes the need for social engineering, time, patience and community understanding. It senses the need for conditioning and education if implementation is ever to be a real success.

Free men are not automatons capable of being molded and transformed forthwith by a new and revolutionary judicial concept which does not square with their collective conscience.

The enormity of the problem of compliance gives great pause. We do not deal with implementation of a decree against a single individual or even a minority. A successful response to the judgment requires reconciliation to it of a great majority of our people. The Court on its part needs for the enforcement of its decree the amelioration of time which is said to be a great Healer. It needs the rallying of those who will stand by the law of the land because it is such whether they agree with it or not and the patience of wise administration which eschews haste, precipitate action and premature procedures.

The Court stands not in need of the whip and the scourge of compulsion to drive our people to obedience, but rather the rational solution of time in which the loyalty, patience and understanding of the law-abiding will come forward and lead the way to peaceful, reasonable and successful compliance.

Not only to be considered is the need of reconciling this collective conscience to desegregation but others of importance to be considered include the safety of school children, the peace of the community, the mutitudinous administrative problems affected, the impact upon teachers' jobs, particularly Negro teachers', the transportation of school children, the revisions of laws and regulations, the redistricting of attendance areas, the reallocation of physical school plant facilities and others involved in the transition from a segregated school system to a non-segregated system. All require time, wise administration and patience for their solution.

Gradual effective adjustment to integration presupposes that there will be a plan. But because there is a wide variety of local conditions, no specific plan can be outlined which would be acceptable under all conditions and in all communities.

BLEED THROUGH

We think integration must proceed in Florida on a county by county basis because of the fundamental differences in various areas of the state which we have attempted to demonstrate in this brief.

A great many plans for integration have been developed in Florida and other states and all of them have their adherents. A plan of gradual integration starting with the first grade and working on up through high school over a 12 year period is believed by some advocates to be the answer for their community but it is rejected in other places.

Another plan for beginning the integration process at the college level and gradually working down to the first grade can be supported by valid arguments, but it too is rejected by many educational leaders as being unworkable in some communities.

Other plans which have been advanced include a gradual reorganization of school attendance areas; designated schools whose students will be composed of volunteers from both races during the transition period; a simultaneous integration of all school grades over a period of time based on the scholastic level of the students as determined by examinations. These and many other plans are being considered by school authorities whose job it will be in the final analysis to devise a plan which will be accepted and will work in their particular school districts.

The one factor which all of these plans share in common is the need for sufficient time to carry them out and the one point on which agreement can be reached by school authorities who are willing to undertake a program of integration is that the plan adopted for their specific area must be unique in that it will take into consideration the exact problems of that area and no other.

If this planning and action is permitted by the Court, we believe that local school authorities should take into consideration two primary factors: first, the material aspects of integration which include the use of present school buildings, the construction of new buildings, transportation, teachers' jobs and assignments, school populations within attendance areas and the administration impracticabilities and inequities that would arise in these dislocations in any effort to effect a too hasty non-segregation; second, the intangible considerations including community thinking, customs, mores, overt acts that might result from the impact of premature integration, the scholastic standards of the schools and the feelings of children.

We realize that objection has been made to gradualism in seeking methods of integrating white and Negro schools, that delay might tend to create feelings of hostility and encourage organized opposition. The advocates of this theory apparently feel that the shock treatment is to be preferred and that if a difficult job has to be done, the quicker it is done, the better.

In this belief we are positive they are mistaken. Strong opposition already exists in the South to desegregation. It will be intensified in direct proportion to the amount of hasty precipitation and coercion that is applied.

Already there is springing up in our state opposition organizations, some of which through their literature encourage violence. Burning of crosses and circulation of hate literature are becoming more and more prevalent. But minimizing these manifestations of defiance are thousands of law-abiding citizens of both races, many influential newspapers and loyal organizations who are trying to meet the situation calmly and patiently. But their attitudes have always been buttressed on the assumption of gradualism and local autonomy. If that assumption is cut from under them by a decree of immediate desegregation or even a decree of a period of short delay which does not permit a large degree of local determination, we frankly doubt whether we can save our public school system. This objection to gradualism may be valid in Northern states where segregation has been practiced but where the people as a whole do not share the intense feelings on racial differences which have become an ingrained part of the culture of the South.

There is no reason to think that sufficient delay in integration of the schools of Florida to allow for a period of gradual adjustment would create new problems or intensify those already existing.

The problems are already here and must be recognized realistically by anyone conscientiously seeking a solution. There is every logical reason to believe that any attempt to use the shock treatment of immediate compulsory integration of schools in Florida would only result in translating the present passive intellectual differences in thought and emotional feelings to an active, positive and violent physical resistance.

When all is said and done, it may be that about the best advice on the subject was contained in a speech by Governor David S. Walker of Florida in 1867 to a meeting of Freedmen in Tallahassee[1].

Governor Walker said:

> "The great question now to be solved, is whether two different races can live in peace together under the same government with equal political rights. In my reading of history, I do not remember any instance in which this has ever been done. But God has placed the work upon us and with His blessing we must try our best to accomplish it. In the first place, therefore, I say let each one of us of all colors resolve to cultivate kindly relations with one another and never allow ourselves to be arrayed in hostility to each other—let us always speak kindly to and of one another. I have never known a man in my life who had the true principles of a Christian gentleman in him, who would wantonly wound the feelings of any human being, however humble."

CONCLUSION

There are two ways in which the Brown decision may be viewed by history. First, it may be considered as a seismic shock which struck without warning and engulfed a large part of the nation in a tidal wave of hate and inflamed emotions and carried away a public school system which took half a century and billions of dollars to build, or Second, it may be looked upon as a high goal which this Court has fixed for men of good will to strive to attain and which they may attain in due course if rational consideration is given to human frailty and faith is maintained in the slow but sure upward movement of democracy.

Many think that our democracy is now face to face with the toughest job in practical government it has ever had to tackle without going to war. Some way must be found to protect the constitutional rights of a minority without ignoring the will of the majority. We think the only answer is time and the patient efforts of those who value democracy more than their personal longings and private prejudices. We hope that this court will accept this answer.

Results of a Survey of Florida Leadership Opinion on the Effects of the U. S. Supreme Court Decision of May 17, 1954 Relating to Segregation in Florida Schools

NO PAGE NUMBER

Introduction

As a result of the decision of the United States Supreme Court of May 17, 1954, declaring unconstitutional racial segregation in public education, Florida and other southern states are confronted with problems of tremendous gravity and complexity.

While it enunciated a new principle of law, the Court did not prescribe the manner in which this principle should be translated into action in the states and communities affected. Instead, it restored the cases to the docket for further argument as to the method of adjustment which should be called for in subsequent decrees, inviting the Attorneys General of states requiring or permitting segregation in public education to appear as amici curiae.

In anticipation of the preparation of a brief for submission in response to this invitation, the Attorney General of the State of Florida requested the assistance of social scientists and other educators in compiling facts concerning the problems which the State of Florida would encounter in complying with the decision of the Court.

This is their report.

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S RESEARCH ADVISORY COMMITTEE FOR THE STUDY OF PROBLEMS OF DESEGREGATION IN FLORIDA SCHOOLS

The committee was chosen by the Attorney General to assist him in conducting a survey to determine leadership opinion among Florida citizens regarding problems created by the U. S. Supreme Court's decision of May 17, 1954, abolishing segregation in the public schools.

The individuals asked to serve on this committee were chosen on the basis of their professional standing in the field of education; their specialized knowledge and training which would be of value in conducting such a survey; and their reputation for civic-mindedness and impartiality. The committee selected Dr. Lewis Killian, Associate Professor of Sociology at Florida State University, to act as director of research and coordinator for the project. While certain parts of this report were written by Dr. Killian and others, the entire report and all its findings have been reviewed and approved by the entire membership of the committee.

The Report and the Conclusions*

Just as the effects of segregation, held by the Court to be discriminatory, are essentially psychological, the problems of desegregation are also social and psychological as much as they are legal.

An eminent student of race relations in the South, Guy B. Johnson, has said, "Anyone who thinks that the transition from segregation to racial co-education can be made without problems, tensions, and even personal tragedies is a fool. Anyone who thinks that the transition means the end of civilization is also a fool."[1]

The purpose of this study was to delineate as far as is possible the problems, the tensions and, perhaps, the tragedies, which might be expected to arise in the course of this transition in Florida communities. This was a fact finding, research study. There was no intent to predict whether this transition will take place nor to make value-judgments as to whether it should or should not occur.

Prediction of the problems which might arise if desegregation of public schools were undertaken in the near future are based upon four types of data. These are:

1. The expressed attitudes of various groups of leaders, both white and Negro, toward the Court's decision and toward the possible implementation of it in Florida.

2. An historical analysis of the way in which Negroes have availed themselves of a privilege from which state restrictions were removed by a similar federal court decision, the privilege of voting in primary elections.

3. An analysis of relevant information pertaining to school administration, instructional services, and the quality of education as they might be affected by desegregation.

4. The experience of other states and communities in which programs of desegregation have been undertaken.

In the study of human behavior it is impossible to ask all of the questions which are relevant to that behavior. The selection of questions always implies certain assumptions concerning the situation being studied, and these assumptions should be made explicit.

The basic assumptions of this study are:

1. That the Court will desire a minimum of intergroup conflict and public disorder in any program of desegregation which might be undertaken. On this assumption, information indicative of the likelihood of conflict and widespread disorder in various situations becomes highly important.

2. That expressed attitudes are to some extent and in certain types of situations indicative of later behavior. This is particularly important when it is the attitudes of occupants of key positions in the power structure of a group which are concerned.

3. That the attitudes of people in leadership, power, and prestige roles are of more importance as determinants of social change than are the attitudes of larger numbers of people not occupying such roles.

BLEED THROUGH

4. That the behavior of people in one situation is to some extent indicative of the behavior of the same or different people in similar but not identical situations.

The conclusions of this study are based on the findings of several separate, but related, constituent studies which, together, constitute the general research project. Each study is presented in detail in a separate subsection of the report. The general conclusions, drawn from all of these studies, are found in the chapter preceding the detailed reports of the separate studies.

The sub-studies, in order of presentation, are:

1. An attitude-opinion poll, based on mailed questionnaires, of 9 white and 2 Negro groups of leaders throughout the state. (Page 113)

2. An attitude-opinion poll, based on personal interviews, of white leaders in 10 selected counties and Negro leaders in 8 of these counties. (Page 153)

3. An historical analysis of trends in Negro voter registration in Florida, 1940-1954. (Page 177)

4. An analysis of relevant information pertaining to school administration and instructional services as they might be affected by desegregation. (Page 185)

5. An intensive study, utilizing various methods, of leadership attitudes and opinions in a metropolitan area and a rural area in southeastern Florida. (Page 201)

GENERAL CONCLUSIONS

1. On the basis of data from all relevant sources included in this study, it is evident that in Florida white leadership opinion with reference to the Supreme Court's decision is far from being homogeneous. Approximately three-fourths of the white leaders polled disagree, in principle, with the decision. There are approximately 30 per cent who violently disagree with the decision to the extent that they would refuse to cooperate with any move to end segregation or would actively oppose it. While the majority of white persons answering opposed the decision, it is also true that a large majority indicated they were willing to do what the courts and school officials decided.

2. A large majority of the Negro leaders acclaim the decision as being right.

3. Only a small minority of leaders of both races advocate immediate, complete desegregation. White leaders, if they accept the idea that segregation should be ended eventually, tend to advocate a very gradual, indefinite transition period, with a preparatory period of education. Negroes tend to advocate a gradual transition, but one beginning soon and lasting over a much shorter period of time.

4. There are definite variations between regions, counties, communities and sections of communities as to whether desegregation can be accomplished, even gradually, without conflict and public disorder. The analysis of trends in Negro registration and voting in primary elections, shows similar variations in the extent to which Negroes have availed themselves of the right to register and vote. At least some of these variations in voting behavior must be accounted for by white resistance to Negro political participation. This indicates that there are regional variations not only in racial attitudes but in overt action.

Regional, county and community variations in responses to questionnaires and interviews are sufficiently marked to suggest that in some communities desegregation could be undertaken now if local leaders so decided, but that in others widespread social disorder would result from immediate steps to end segregation. There would be problems, of course, in any area of the state, but these would be vastly greater in some areas than in others.

5. While a minority of both white and Negro leaders expect serious violence to occur if desegregation is attempted, there is a widespread lack of confidence in the ability of peace officers to maintain law and order if serious violence does start. This is especially true of the peace officers themselves, except in Dade County. This has important implications. While it is true that expressed attitudes are not necessarily predictive of actual behavior, there seems little doubt that there is a minority of whites who would actively and violently resist desegregation, especially immediate desegregation. It has been concluded from the analysis of experiences with desegregation in other areas, "A small minority may precipitate overt resistance or violent opposition to desegregation in spite of general acceptance or accommodation by the majority."[2]

6. Opposition of peace officers to desegregation, lack of confidence in their ability to maintain law and order in the face of violent resistance, and the existence of a positive relationship between these two opinions indicates that less than firm, positive action to prevent public disorder might be expected from many of the police, especially in some communities. Elected officials, county and school, also show a high degree of opposition. Yet it has been pointed out, again on the basis of experience in other states, that the accomplishment of efficient desegregation with a minimum of social disturbance depends upon.

A. A clear and unequivocal statement of policy by leaders with prestige and other authorities;

---

2. Kenneth B. Clark, "Findings," Journal of Social Issues, IX, No. 4 (1953), 50.

B. Firm enforcement of the changed policy by authorities and persistence in the execution of this policy in the face of initial resistance;

C. A willingness to deal with violations, attempted violations, and incitement to violations by a resort to the law and strong enforcement action;

D. A refusal of the authorities to resort to, engage in or tolerate subterfuges, gerrymandering or other devices for evading the principles and the fact of desegregation;

E. An appeal to the individuals concerned in terms of their religious principles of brotherhood and their acceptance of the American traditions of fair play and equal justice.

It may be concluded that the absence of a firm, enthusiastic public policy of making desegregation effective would create the type of situation in which attitudes would be most likely to be translated into action.[4]

7. In view of white feelings that immediate desegregation would not work and that to require it would constitute a negation of local autonomy, it may be postulated that the chances of developing firm official and, perhaps, public support for any program of desegregation would be increased by a decree which would create the feeling that the Court recognizes local problems and will allow a gradual transition with some degree of local determination.

8. There is a strong likelihood that many white children would be withdrawn from public schools by their parents and sent to private schools. It seems logical, however, that this practice would be confined primarily to families in the higher income brackets. As a result, a form of socio-economic class segregation might be substituted for racial segregation in education.

---

4. Experience shows that when the steps listed above have been taken, predictions of serious social disturbance have not been borne out.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

9. It is evident that a vast area of misunderstanding as to each other's feelings about segregation exists between the races. White leaders believe Negroes to be much more satisfied with segregation than Negroes are and Negro leaders believe that whites are much more willing to accept desegregation gracefully than whites proved to be. Hence a logical first step towards implementing the principle set forth by the Court, and one suggested by both whites and Negroes, would seem to be the taking of positive, cooperative steps to bridge this gap and establish better understanding between the two groups.

10. Although relatively few Negro leaders and teachers show concern about the problem, white answers indicate that Negro teachers would encounter great difficulty in obtaining employment in mixed schools. To the extent that desegregation might proceed without parallel changes in attitudes towards the employment of Negro teachers in mixed schools, economic and professional hardships would be worked on the many Negro teachers of Florida.

11. Since 1940, and particularly since 1947, the State of Florida has made rapid and steady progress toward the elimination of disparities between white and Negro educational facilities as measured by such tangible factors as teacher salaries, current expenditure per pupil, teacher qualifications, and capital outlay expenditure per pupil.

12. In spite of the current ambiguity as to the future of dual, "separate but equal" school facilities the State is proceeding with an extensive program of construction of new school facilities for both white and Negro pupils, with a recommended capital outlay of $370 per Negro pupil and $210 per white pupil. Both this and the previous finding indicate that, while these steps have been taken within the framework of a dual educational system, there is a sincere desire and willingness on the part of the elected officials and the people of Florida to furnish equal education for all children.

13. Available achievement test scores of white and Negro high school seniors in Florida indicate that, at least in the upper grades, many Negro pupils placed in classrooms with white pupils would find themselves set apart not only by color but by the quality of their work. It is not implied that these differences in scores have an innate racial basis, but it seems likely that they stem from differences in economic and cultural background extending far beyond the walls of the segregated school, into areas of activity not covered by this decision.

14. Interracial meetings and cooperative activities already engaged in by teachers and school administrators in many counties demonstrate steps that can be, and are being taken voluntarily and through local choice to contribute to the development of greater harmony and understanding between whites and Negroes in Florida communities.

Leadership Opinion By Questionnaire ...and Conclusions*

Although all of the people of Florida would be affected, directly or indirectly, by any move to end racial segregation in the public schools, some groups have a more direct and intense involvement in the situation than do others.

People connected with county school systems such as school board members, school trustees, superintendents, principals, teachers and supervisors would play key roles in putting any plan for desegregation into effect. Police officers, judges and county attorneys would be required to deal with cases of conflict and disorder which might arise. Parents are deeply involved not only as parents but as voters and taxpayers. As moulders of public opinion newspaper editors, radio station managers and ministers have an important relationship to any developing social change. Legislators and county commissioners would be faced with the task of formulating new state and county policies relating to this significant legal and social change.

---

* Prepared by Dr. Lewis Killian, Department of Sociology, Florida State University.

In an attempt to get at the attitudes and opinions of these important segments of the population, questionnaires were mailed to the following groups:

1. All members of the Florida Peace Officers Association.
2. School principals, white and Negro, and school supervisors.
3. Negro PTA presidents, white PTA presidents, council chairmen and board members.
4. School board members and school trustees.
5. County judges, circuit judges, state attorneys, county solicitors and county commissioners.
6. Newspaper editors.
7. Radio station managers.
8. Members of the state legislature.
9. Ministers (a 10 per cent sample of certain denominations).

Practical considerations precluded polling certain other groups. The large number of teachers, white and colored, in the state and the fact that so many would be away from home at the time of the survey made a poll of their opinions impractical. It was practical, however, and perhaps more important, to question principals and supervisors, as school people who work intimately with the teachers in positions of leadership and authority. Similarly, the parent group polled was limited to PTA officers because of the tremendous number of parents involved and the non-availability of any list from which a sample could be drawn.

The ministers presented a special problem. The size of the population of ministers, which could only be estimated, was obviously large. At the same time it was extremely difficult to obtain comprehensive mailing lists for even part of the multitude of denominations to which these ministers might belong. Mailing lists were obtained for the following denominations: Baptist, Methodist, Episcopal, Roman Catholic, Presbyterian, and Assembly of God. Questionnaires were mailed to a 10 per cent sample of the clergymen on each of these lists. Forms were also sent to a sample of Negro Methodist and Baptist ministers, but the returns were too small for use. In many cases they were returned marked "Unclaimed" or "Moved, Left No Address."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

The Questionnaires.

Nine different questionnaires were used in this survey. Questions designed to elicit the following information were included on all of them:

1. The position held by the subject and the section of the state in which he lived and worked.

2. The subject's personal feelings about the rightness of the Court's decision and action which should be taken as a result of it.

3. The subject's estimate of the likelihood of resistance to desegregation in his community, the forms this resistance might take, and the ability of law enforcement officers to maintain law and order in the event of serious violence.

The questionnaire sent to the peace officers sought also an estimate of the likelihood that peace officers would enforce school attendance laws for mixed schools. All other questionnaires included questions concerning the following additional items:

4. The subject's estimate of the feelings about the decision and its implementation of other groups in the state and in his community.

5. The subject's opinion as to the method which would be most effective in ending public school segregation.

6. Opinions as to the grades in which it would be easiest to start admitting colored and white children to the same schools.

Finally, principals and supervisors, school officials, legislators and PTA officers were asked whether certain things which might constitute either aids or obstacles to desegregation might happen in the event schools are desegregated in the next few years.

Questionnaire Returns and Method of Analysis.

A total of 7,749 questionnaires were mailed. Time did not permit a follow-up wave, but an effort was made to increase returns by prefacing each form with a personal appeal from the Attorney General and by enclosing a stamped, self-addressed envelope.

Useable questionnaires returned number 3,972, 51.26 per cent of the number mailed. The number and percentage of returns for each group are shown in Table 1. The lowest percentage of returns is seen to be that for the Negro PTA presidents, 21.5 per cent. The rate of return for all groups may be regarded as satisfactory since it has been found that in mail polls usually less than 20 percent of the questionnaires are returned.[3]

Practical considerations, of which there are many in what is essentially "action research," precluded the use of standard techniques for control of the sample by ascertaining the characteristics of non-respondents. Hence extreme caution must be exercised in generalizing from these data to any population.

It is possible to speculate as to some of the reasons for non-returns. It is known that some forms did not reach the subject for one reason or another. Unfortunately

BLEED THROUGH

237 questionnaires were returned too late for tabulation. In the case of refusals other possible reasons must be considered. In some groups, a relatively low degree of education may have characterized persons who did not respond. It is known that in some cases public officials, particularly judges, failed to reply because they felt it was unethical for them to answer such an inquiry, even though anonymity was promised them. Some questionnaires were returned not completed but with a brief comment. The nature of many of these comments suggests that many of the white subjects who refused to respond were violently opposed to desegregation.

On the basis of these speculations, it seems likely that the prevalent bias of white non-respondents is in the direction of opposition to the Supreme Court's decision and to attempts to implement it. In the case of Negroes, it is more likely that distrust of the motives of the research and fear of expressing their opinions were the causes of failure to reply.

All questions were of the check-list type. Questionnaires were coded, punched on cards, and machine tabulated.[4] For purposes of analysis, the subjects were regarded as populations not necessarily representative of any larger populations. Hence percentages are presented but no tests of statistical significance have been made. Conclusions are based, therefore, only upon gross differences in responses.

Even though these respondents cannot be regarded as a representative sample, the nature of their selections makes them important as groups. In spite of its scientific limitations, this poll constitutes the most comprehensive and extensive assessment of public opinion in Florida through the use of scientifically devised instruments that is available. The fact that approximately one-half of such groups of leaders, in the case of whites, and approximately one-third, in the case of Negroes, expressed the opinions indicated below is of itself important.

Findings.

Bearing in mind the caution which should be used in generalizing to larger populations, the following conclusions may be drawn from the responses of those subjects who did return questionnaires:

1. White groups differ greatly from each other in their attitudes towards the Court's decision, ranging from nearly unanimous disagreement to a slight predominance of favorable attitudes.

In Table 2 there can be seen the percentages of respondents in each group who selected each of the choices indicative of his personal feelings. Table 3 shows combinations of these choices into categories of "Agreement," "Neutral," and "Disagreement." From these tables it can be seen that peace officers are overwhelmingly opposed to the principle that segregation should be ended. On the other hand, a slight majority of white principals, supervisors and ministers indicate agreement with the principle established by the court, although they vary in their opinions as to when it should be implemented. Other groups ranking high in disagreement with the decision are county officials, school officials and white PTA leaders.

2. White groups also differ from each other in willingness to comply with whatever courts and school boards decide to do regardless of their personal feelings.

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

In Table 4 combinations of choices shown in Table 2 are presented to show willingness to comply with official policy or intention to resist or refuse to cooperate. In this case elected officials, including county officials, school officials, and legislators, rank high in intention to oppose action to bring about desegregation, as do white PTA leaders. White principals and supervisors rank very low in intention to oppose desegregation.

3. Peace officers are the white group most opposed to desegregation. (Table 3).

4. Almost no whites believe that desegregation should be attempted immediately. (Table 2).

5. A large majority of both Negro groups are in agreement with the Court's decision declaring segregation unconstitutional. (Table 3).

6. While only a small minority of both Negro groups believe that desegregation should be attempted immediately, an even smaller minority would oppose attempts to bring about desegregation or refuse to cooperate. (Table 2).

7. Only a minority of whites in all groups believe that opponents of desegregation would resort to mob violence in trying to stop it. A larger proportion, but still a minority, believe that serious violence would result if desegregation were attempted in their community in the next few years.

Table 5 shows the predictions of the occurrence of mob violence and serious violence by all groups. It is evident that "mob violence" and "serious violence" do not mean exactly the same thing to the subjects. It may be noted that the peace officer group ranks highest in percentage predicting both mob violence and serious violence.

8. A yet smaller minority of both of the Negro groups anticipate mob violence or serious violence as a result of steps towards desegregation. (Table 5).

9. The majority of all white groups are not sure that peace officers could cope with serious violence if it did occur in their communities, replying either "No" or "Don't Know" to the question.

Table 6 shows the percentage of each group replying either "No" or "Don't Know" to the question, "Do you think the peace officers in your community would be able to maintain law and order if serious violence is started?" Again it may be noted that the peace officer group ranks highest in percentage showing doubt as to the ability to avoid or minimize violence.

10. A much smaller proportion of both Negro groups express doubts as to the ability of law enforcement officials to deal with serious violence. (Table 6).

11. The majority of most of the white groups believe that peace officers could maintain law and order if minor violence occurred.

Table 7 shows the percentage of respondents in each group who answered "Yes" to the question, "Do you think the peace officers in your community would be able to maintain law and order if minor violence is started?" The white PTA leaders differed markedly from other groups, only 34.13 per cent answering "Yes."

12. The Negro groups did not differ greatly from the white groups in the proportion believing that police could cope with minor violence. (Table 7).

13. Only 13.24 per cent of 1669 peace officers believe that most of the peace officers they know would enforce attendance laws for mixed schools.

14. A majority of the members of all white groups except peace officers, who were not asked; radio station managers; and ministers, believe that most of the people of Florida and most of the white people in their communities disagree with the Court's decision.

Table 8 shows the percentage of the 10 groups asked to assess the feelings of other people who felt that most of the members of the groups about which they were asked disagreed with the decision.

15. In the five white groups asked, from one-fourth to one-half of the respondents believed that most of the Negroes in their community were opposed to the desegregation ruling. (Table 8).

16. A much smaller proportion of both Negro groups believe that most of the people of Florida, most of the whites in their community, and particularly the Negroes in their communities are in disagreement with the principle of desegregation. (Table 8).

It was seen earlier that only a small minority of the Negro respondents personally disagreed with the decision. It may be seen now that only a small minority of these Negroes think that other Negroes in their communities are in disagreement with the court. Furthermore, a much smaller proportion of Negroes than of whites think that most white people in Florida are in favor of segregation as a legal principle.

17. Only a small minority of all groups, white and Negro, believe that immediate assignment of children to schools on the basis of geographical location rather than race would be the most effective way of ending public school segregation.

Table 9 shows the percentage of each of 8 groups choosing as the most effective method immediate desegregation, a very gradual transition, and either or both of two gradual but relatively early methods of ending segregation. While the peace officers were not asked this question, their answers to the question on "personal feelings about the decision" (Table 2) indicate almost unanimous opposition to immediate desegregation.

18. All groups think a gradual program of desegregation would be most effective. Negroes, however, prefer that the process start within the next year or two with immediate, limited integration much more frequently than do whites. The whites prefer a very gradual transition with no specified time for action to begin. (Table 9).

19. Whites who expressed an opinion believe that the primary grades and the colleges are the levels on which desegregation could be initiated most easily. On the other hand, almost as many Negroes believed that segregation should be ended on most or all grade levels simultaneously as believed it should be ended first at the lowest and highest grade levels.

20. The maintenance of discipline in mixed classes by Negro teachers is regarded as a potential problem by a majority of white principals, supervisors and PTA leaders. A much smaller proportion of Negroes regarded this as a problem, with a majority of Negro principals believing that colored teachers could maintain discipline in mixed classes.

Table 11 shows the percentage of each group queried as to possible problems who indicated definite belief that certain things would or would not happen, thereby creating problems for mixed schools.

21. A majority of all white groups believe that white people would resist desegregation by withdrawing their children from the public schools, but a much smaller proportion of Negroes, less than a majority, believe that this would happen. (Table 11).

22. Almost two-thirds of white school officials—superintendents, board members, and trustees—believe that applications of Negroes to teach in mixed schools would be rejected. (Table 11).

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

23. Nearly three-fourths of school officials believe that it would be difficult to get white teachers for mixed schools. (Table 11).

24. Almost half of school officials and a little over 40 per cent of white PTA leaders believe that the people of their communities would not support taxes for desegregated schools, but only about 20 per cent of Negro PTA leaders believe that such support would not be forthcoming. (Table 11).

25. In the case of all potential problems on which both Negroes and white were questioned a smaller proportion of Negroes than of whites indicate belief that problems would arise as a result of desegregation. (Table 11).

26. In the case of peace officers there is a positive relationship between personal disagreement with the decision and lack of confidence in the ability of peace officers to cope with serious violence. There is an even higher positive relationship between belief that segregation should be kept and belief that peace officers would not enforce school attendance laws for mixed schools.

Table 12 shows the number of peace officers who feel that the police could or could not maintain law and order if serious violence occurs, according to their attitude towards the decision and its implementation. Table 13 shows belief as to whether peace officers would enforce school attendance laws by attitude towards the decision. The officers who answer "Don't know" to these questions are omitted from these tables. While peace officers were asked what they thought other law enforcement officials could or would do and were not asked what they themselves would do, it is evident that these subjects are projecting their own feelings and, perhaps, their intentions into other peace officers.

Regional Variations.

The responses to certain items of the two largest groups polled, the peace officers and the white school principals and supervisors, were analyzed by region of the state in which the respondents lived. The 67 counties of Florida were grouped into 8 regions defined by social scientists at the Florida State University in Florida Facts.[1] These regions and the counties each includes are:

Region	Counties
I	Bay, Escambia, Gulf, Okaloosa, Santa Rosa (Extreme northwest Florida).
II	Baker, Calhoun, Citrus, Columbia, Dixie, Franklin, Gadsden, Gilchrist, Hamilton, Hernando, Holmes, Jackson, Jefferson, Lafayette, Leon, Levy, Liberty, Madison, Suwannee, Taylor, Wakulla, Walton, Washington. (Northwest and north central Florida).
III	Alachua, Bradford, Clay, Putnam, Union. (Northeast Florida, inland).
IV	Lake, Marion, Orange, Osceola, Polk, Seminole, Sumter. (Central Florida, inland, largely rural).
V	Brevard, Duval, Flagler, Indian River, Nassau, St. Johns, Volusia. (Northeast and Middle Florida coastal region, includes Jacksonville metropolitan area).
VI	Charlotte, Collier, Hillsborough, Lee, Manatee, Pasco, Pinellas, Sarasota. (Southwest coastal, includes Tampa-St. Petersburg, Bradenton-Sarasota metropolitan area).
VII	DeSoto, Glades, Hardee, Hendry, Highlands, Okeechobee. (South central, inland, rural, many migrant farm laborers).

Lucie. (Southeast coastal, contains Miami metropolitan area and some migratory labor areas).

Clear-cut regional variations in attitudes and opinions are found to exist, as is indicated by the following findings:

27. Although the majority of peace officers in all regions feel that segregation should be kept, the percentage feeling so varies from 83 per cent in two regions to 100 per cent in one region.

Personal feelings of peace officers about the decision are presented, by region, in Table 14. The variation in the number of respondents in the different regions seems to be explainable in terms of the number of counties in the different regions and the size of population. While it was impossible to ascertain the number of questionnaires mailed to each region, the distribution of returns of peace officer questionnaires approximates the distribution of population by region. It should be noted that Region VII ranks highest in percentage of peace officers who oppose desegregation, while Regions I and VIII rank lowest.

28. The percentage of white principals and supervisors who are in disagreement with the decision varies from 20 per cent to 60 per cent in different regions.

The percentage of white principals and supervisors agreeing and disagreeing with the decision, by region, is shown in Table 15. Again Region VII ranks highest in amount of opposition and Region VIII ranks lowest.

29. A large majority of white principals and supervisors in all regions indicate that they would comply with the decision regardless of personal feelings, but the percentage varies from 76 per cent in Region VII to approximately 94 per cent in Regions VI and VIII. (Table 16).

30. The percentage of peace officers predicting mob violence as a method of resisting desegregation varies from 20 per cent in Region VIII to nearly 63 per cent in Region VII. (Table 17).

31. Percentages of both peace officers and white principals and supervisors predicting serious violence in the event desegregation is attempted vary widely between some regions. (Table 18).

32. The majority of both peace officers and white principals and supervisors in all regions doubt that the police could maintain law and order if serious violence occurred, but there are some regional variations. (Table 19).

Responses of Legislators.

Although the 79 members of the state legislature who returned questionnaires constitute almost 45 per cent of the 176 legislators and legislative nominees to whom the forms were sent, generalizations to the entire membership of the legislature on the basis of their responses are entirely unwarranted. Any attempt to predict the action of the legislature at its next session would be even more presumptuous. The responses of these legislators to two special questions asked of them are presented below as a matter of interest, however.

The legislators were asked to indicate which of five possible courses of action should be followed at the next session of the legislature. The percentage checking each course, and the details of the five courses of action, are shown in Table 20.

The legislators were also asked whether they believed that there is any legal way to continue segregation in Florida Schools indefinitely. Of the 79 respondents, 34.20 per cent replied "Yes", 25.31 per cent replied "No", and 39.32 per cent answered "Don't Know", or gave no answer.

CONCLUSIONS

1. It is evident that white respondents drawn from different areas of leadership vary sharply in their feelings about the rectitude of the Supreme Court's decision of May 17, 1954. At least this small, but not unimportant, segment of leaders in Florida is far from unanimous in allegiance to the principle of segregation in public education.

2. There are definite regional variations in attitudes towards the decision, in predictions of the likelihood that serious violence may occur if desegregation is attempted, and in confidence in the ability of the police to maintain law and order if serious violence does occur.

3. A majority of all groups except Negro principals do not feel confident that the police in their communities could cope with serious violence. This is particularly true of the peace officers themselves. At the same time, serious violence is anticipated by only a minority of all groups, although by almost 50 per cent of the peace officers.

4. Withdrawal of white children from the public schools, the maintenance of discipline in mixed classes by Negro teachers, refusal to employ Negro teachers for mixed schools, and difficulty in obtaining white teachers are the outstanding potential problems found to be expected.

5. It is evident that the white and Negro groups view the decision and the problem which desegregation might create quite differently, and that they do not understand each other's attitudes. The majority of the whites are, in various degrees, opposed to the decision; the Negroes are in favor of it. Yet the whites believe that the Negroes are opposed to desegregation to a much greater extent than those Negro groups polled are found to be. Furthermore, the white and Negro groups assess Negro opinion differ-ently, a much larger proportion of whites than Negroes believing that most Negroes prefer segregated schools.

The whites view the effecting of desegregation as a much more difficult and dangerous problem than do the Negroes, many more of them foreseeing serious problems and even violence. On the other hand, the Negroes have more confidence in the ability and the willingness of the whites to adapt to desegregation than do the whites themselves.

6. The majority of all groups, white and Negro, believe that desegregation should be put into effect gradually rather than abruptly and immediately. More Negroes than whites, however, are in favor of early integration on a limited scale and beginning in the next year or two. The whites favor a more indefinite and remote form of gradualism, if they will countenance the idea of desegregation at all.

7. The existence of a positive relationship between the attitudes of peace officers towards the decision and their predictions of the inability of police to control serious violence suggests the existence of a tendency to project their own feelings into situations which might arise and into other persons involved. Such highly subjective predictions are very likely to be indications of what the respondent himself would do, or feels he could do, in the situation. Such predictions might very well take on the character of "self-fulfilling prophecies."[2] If police officers do not believe that they or others would be able to maintain law and order if serious violence occurs, the likelihood that they will attempt wholeheartedly to do so is accordingly reduced.

2. An outstanding American sociologist, Robert K. Merton, has defined the "self-fulfilling prophecy" as a "false definition of the situation evolving a new behavior which makes the originally false conception come true." See his article, "The Self-Fulfilling Prophecy," The Antioch Review, VIII (Summer, 1948), 193-210.

Leadership Opinion By Personal Interview ...and Conclusions*

While the mail questionnaire method may produce a large volume of data in a short time, this method has many disadvantages. One of the most important is the difficulty encountered in analyzing the answers to open-ended questions, questions which the subject may answer in his own words. Another limitation is the difficulty encountered in reaching subjects who are not included on some mailing list, such as informal, non-official leaders in a community power structure. Hence the mail questionnaire study of leadership opinion in the state was supplemented by a study of leadership opinion in 10 selected counties by the use of personal interviews.

Selection of Counties.

The 10 counties selected by the Research Advisory Committee for intensive study included: Charlotte, Hillsborough and Pinellas, in the southwest coastal region; Orange and Lake, in the central, so-called "Ridge Section" of the peninsula; Duval, in the northeast coastal region; Lafayette, a rural, inland county in the the north central portion; Gadsden, a rural county in the northwest part of the state; and Washington, a rural county, and Escambia, an urban county, in the extreme northwest portion of the panhandle of Florida.

In the selection of these counties, the following factors were considered:

1. Representation of the different sections of the state. (The southeast section was not included because an intensive study was made in Dade County and nearby areas by the University of Miami).

2. Inclusion of both rural and urban counties.

3. Inclusion of counties with less than 10 per cent Negro population (2) or more than 50 per cent (1). The state has 5 counties in the former category and 2 counties in the latter.

4. Inclusion of certain counties which, on the basis of preliminary evidence, appeared to be areas of relatively high or relatively low resistance to desegregation.

Method of Study.

Interviews were conducted by 16 public school employees from various counties, 12 white and 4 Negro principals or supervisors. No interviewer was assigned to work in his home county. For unavoidable practical reasons, no interviews with Negro subjects were obtained in two counties, and in three other counties only a limited number were obtained, these by white interviewers.

The interviewers, all carefully chosen for the task, were given one day of intensive training in the selection of subjects for interview, interviewing techniques, and interview recording. A schedule consisting of thirteen open-ended questions, similar to the structured questions used on the mail questionnaire and supplemented by suggested probing questions, was furnished. The interviewers were also given a list of community leaders, official and non-official, whom they should attempt to interview. It should be noted that the field workers were instructed to follow the advice of local informants in selecting subjects, both white and Negro, considered to be important figures in the power structure of the community.

Each interviewer wrote, at the completion of his field work, an independent analysis of the situation in the county he studied. In addition, a content analysis was made of all interviews by a team of eight analysts, four white and four Negro, from the State Department of Education, the Florida A. and M. University, and the Florida State University. In this analysis the interviews were coded for IBM tabulation.[1] After analysis and coding were completed, approximately one-half of the interviews were coded for two items a second time by another member of the team, white and Negro members exchanging interviews. A reliability check on these items revealed a high degree of reliability between ratings by separate analysts, indicating that personal and racial biases in the interpretation of the interview protocols were slight.

Findings.

Interviews were obtained from a total of 460 white subjects and 195 Negro subjects. Of the white subjects, 263 were official leaders (County, city and school officials, judges, peace officers, and school employees) and 197 were non-official leaders (business, professional, civic club, religious, labor, youth). There were 42 Negro subjects who were school employees, and 153 non-official Negro leaders, including a large number of insurance men, undertakers, and independent business men.

Distribution of the interviews by counties, for Negro and white, are shown below:

County	White	Negro
Charlotte	34	None
Duval	47	31
Escambia	40	64
Gadsden	27	7
Hillsborough	79	43
Lafayette	20	None
Lake	43	7
Orange	47	21
Pinellas	90	13
Washington	33	9

On the basis of statistical analysis of the interviews and the impressions reported by the field staff, the findings indicated below were reached. Although a different method of study was used, these findings do not differ significantly from those of the questionnaire study.

These findings are:

1. The majority of white subjects (67.7 per cent) are in disagreement with the decision, but only 4.1 per cent of the Negroes interviewed disagreed.

Even white subjects who thought the decision was right expressed, for the most part, fear that violence would occur if desegregation were not worked out gradually or if, in the words of some, "it is crammed down our throats." Some whites violently opposed to the decision made such statements as, "The decision is an outrage; it is wrong and will never work," and "These colored children should be treated in such a way that they would not want to come back to school."

BLEED THROUGH

BLURRED COPY

On the other hand, a Negro interviewer summarized the opinions of Negroes in one county in the words, "God is behind the court's decision. He will see that it is carried out, but he doesn't want us to hasten," and in another county in the words, "This problem should have been met squarely years ago. There is no need attempting to circumvent, but settle the problem once and for all instead of passing it into the laps of our children."

2. Slightly less than half (45.7) per cent of the whites indicated that they would not cooperate with the decision of the courts or local school officials as to how to effect desegregation, only 16 per cent indicating that they would actively oppose attempts to end segregation.

Caution must be exercised in inferring that a major segment of the white leadership represented here would "go along" with any plan for desegregation, regardless of its nature. It must be considered that many informants may have been indicating willingness to comply with what they thought the courts and, particularly, the school officials would do, but not with anything that they might possibly decide.

3. One reason given by white subjects for disagreement with the decision was that it is a violation of "states' rights" and, in effect, a negation of local autonomy.

4. White leaders are almost unanimously opposed to any immediate steps to end segregation in their communities, only 4 out of 460 favoring such steps.

5. Of the Negro leaders, only 28.2 per cent favor immediate ending of all segregation in public education in their communities, but 58.9 per cent believe that the transition should begin within the next three years.

6. Whites and Negroes differ sharply in their assessment of white community opinion on the decision, 77 per cent of the white leaders believing most of the white people in their communities disagree with the decision, but only 25.1 per cent of the Negroes believing this.

7. Whites and Negroes differ sharply in their assessment of Negro opinion in their communities, 54.3 per cent of the white leaders believing that most Negroes disagree with the decision, but only 6.1 per cent of the Negro leaders believing so.

8. While only 30 per cent of the whites believe that even a few Negro children could be admitted now to a previously all white school without resulting violence, 76.4 per cent of the Negroes believe that this could be done without causing violence.

9. Of the subjects answering the question (210 white, 82 Negro), a majority of Negroes (89 per cent) believe that peace officers could and would maintain law and order if violence started, but only 46.7 per cent of the whites believe this. A great many subjects in both groups did not answer this question.

10. While many white leaders seem to expect trouble and even violence to occur if desegregation is attempted, there was no definite group or category of people which was specified by more than 10 per cent of the respondents as being likely to cause this trouble.

11. White leaders designated the primary grades and the colleges and universities most frequently as the best place to start desegregation if it were undertaken (primary—31.7 per cent; college—13.3 per cent; both—8.5 per cent) but Negro leaders designated all grades from primary through high school most often (32.3 per cent).

12. Specific problems other than violence which might arise from desegregation were identified by a greater proportion of whites than of Negroes, although only a minority of each group designated any given eventuality as a likely problem. The problems most often designated by whites were: getting white teachers to teach in mixed schools; using Negro teachers in mixed schools; maintaining discipline on school busses and in classes; getting white parents to send their children to mixed public schools; keeping present academic standards; and getting tax support for mixed schools.

13. In no county does it appear that more than a small segment of whites is ready to accept immediate and abrupt desegregation. In two counties, however, a majority of the white leadership interviewed (in one, 59.5 per cent, in the other, 72.4 per cent) believe that desegregation can be accomplished peacefully and effectively if it is done over a period of years, with a preparatory program of education, and at a rate determined by the local citizens.

14. In one county, the high frequency of belief among white leaders that segregation should be kept, that violence would result from desegregation, and that peace officers could not cope with such violence, makes it appear very likely that conflict and disorder would result if an attempt to start desegregation by any means was undertaken even within from five to ten years from the present.

15. Inspection of the interview protocols and the reports of the field staff reveal that even within counties there is wide variation in readiness by whites of different communities to accept desegregation.

In one county there is one community in which both Negro and white leaders fear serious violence, in which organized, violent opposition to desegregation is anticipated, and in which, indeed, organized but peaceful opposition has already appeared. In the same county is a community in which, in the judgment of both white and Negro interviewers, gradual but effective desegregation could be accomplished in the next few years. Similar situations exist in all but two of the counties, both predominantly rural but differing in region and proportion of Negroes in the population.

16. Concrete suggestions for effective first steps towards gradual desegregation offered by subjects include a period of education preparatory to the first steps, and the working together in interracial committees of adults who would study together the problems confronting their community.

RELIABILITY OF JUDGMENTS IN THE ANALYSIS OF RECORDED INTERVIEWS ON THE SUBJECT OF THE SUPREME COURT'S SEGREGATION DECISION*

Eight trained social scientists—four Negro, four white—made the analysis of 657 interviews recorded on the subject of the Supreme Court decision declaring segregation unconstitutional. Each judge analyzed approximately 80, using a scale devised for the specific case at hand.

To indicate the reliability of ratings by the judges, two items were arbitrarily selected for analysis. The two items selected were thought to offer representative difficulties to the judges. The judges were paired—one white and one Negro—and each judge independently re-rated half of his partner's interviews on the two items.

The first item concerned a judgment of the personal feeling of the respondent on the following scale:

1. Firmly in favor of the decision, and believe that schools should be immediately opened to both races throughout Florida.

2. Firmly in favor of the decision and feel schools should be gradually combined, taking into consideration places which need more preparation.

3. Feel that such a decision should have been made eventually, but believe we are not ready for it. Feel we must move very slowly and cautiously.

4. Neither in favor of or against the decision; will agree with whatever the courts and school officials do.

5. Against the decision, but will agree with whatever the courts and school officials do.

(2. It won't work.
(3. Indecisive.
(4. Can be worked out, but will take time.
(5. Integration can take place soon.

The plan for statistical analysis included percent of agreement between judges, Chi square, and the contingency coefficient for each of the eight sets of paired judgements.

For purposes of reporting and analysis, it was deemed more meaningful to combine categories in both items to form a directional scale. A preliminary check revealed that the categories were probably too finely drawn to be highly reliable as specific categories. In the first item, categories 1, 2, 3, and 9, and categories 5, 6, 7, 8, were used to indicate "in favor" or "against" the decision, respectively. In the second item, categories 1 and 2, and categories 4 and 5 were used to indicate "unfavorable" and "favorable", respectively. There were no interviews rated as 0 or x.

Table 1 shows (1) the percent of agreement between the pairs of judges on both items and (2) the total number of paired judgments made by each pair. The consistency of the judges is evident.* It is especially important that consistency of judgment was found between white and Negro judges.

Tables 2-5 indicate the ratings given the personal attitude of the interviewees by the four pairs of judges.

Each of the extremely high values of Chi square would occur much less than .001 times by chance alone. Inspection of the tables will show the positive relationship of the judges' ratings. The contingency coefficients indicate the degree of association.

Tables 6-9 indicate the classifications of the interviews according to "general tone." Here again each of the extremely high values of Chi square would occur much less than .001 times by chance alone. The relationship of the judges' classifications is also a positive one, the contingency coefficients indicating the degree of association.

Note must be made of violation of an assumption basic to the use of the Chi square statistic. Several of the theoretical cell frequencies in each table are less than 5. In this case the violation is not as serious as it might be, because the values of Chi square are extremely high. Reference is made to the article on the Chi-square test by Lewis and Burke.[1]

The four independent indicators of reliability for each of these items are acceptably high. The extension of acceptable reliability to other items of the interview analysis must be made on logical grounds alone.

Analysis of Negro Registration and Voting in Florida 1940-1954*

This is a study of the trend of Negro registration for voting for the years 1940-1954, an example of the way Negroes have begun to take advantage of a privilege from which State restrictions were removed by a federal court decision.

The reliability of figures on registrations is questionable. In many instances supervisors have failed to keep accurate and up-to-date records, and in several instances the report made to the Secretary of State differs from that made to the Attorney General. It is impossible to compare the percent of negroes over 21 registered with the percent of whites over 21 registered; many counties report more white registrants than there are adults over 21 according to the 1950 census.

Immediately evident from graphs of the number of Negroes registered is the tremendous increase in registration following 1944 when the decision in Smith v. Allwright (321 U.S. 649) was made applicable to Florida through further litigation.

NO PAGE NUMBER

Evident from a county-by-county report is the great variation among counties in the percentage of non-whites over 21 who are registered.

There is also a variation in the time when Negro registrants increased. The following table shows the time pattern for counties with no Negroes registered.

Number of Counties with No Negro Registrants

1940—51
1944—36
1946— 4—Madison, Liberty, Lafayette, Union, Hendry (2)
1948— 4—Madison, Liberty, Lafayette, Union (1), Hendry
1950— 5—Madison, Liberty, Lafayette, Union, Calhoun 1952— 4—Madison, Liberty, Lafayette, Union
1954— 3—Liberty, Lafayette, Union

The counties which have had no Negroes registered since 1946 have all been in north Florida, except for Hendry which left this group in 1950.

Madison county is a good example both of how rapidly situations can change and the techniques necessary to produce a change. Madison County had no Negro registrants until just before the 1954 primaries. At this time 586 Negroes went to the courthouse en masse and were registered. According to the supervisor of registration most of the registrants exercised their franchise.

In 1952, the counties in North Central Florida (the plantation-South culture) showed a generally uniform pattern of a low percentage of Negro registrants. All 4 counties with no Negroes registered are in this bloc.

Very interesting are the Florida counties, especially in North Florida, showing a high percentage of Negroes registered. These reports would bear close examination in light of participation reports and other studies. Where urban machines are known to operate the pattern is not surprising. In other counties the explanations do not come easily.

Graphs showing absolute numbers of Negro registrants from 1940 through 1954, and the percent of adult Negroes registered for those years, are attached for each of the 12 counties under interview scrutiny.

"We don't mind for our niggers to register, but we don't let 'em vote", a North Florida official is quoted as saying. The questionnaire sent to supervisors furnishes the only information on the number of Negroes who actually vote. Many of these figures were plainly labelled "estimates", others probably are.

Many reports must be interpreted in one of two ways:

(1) They are either poor guesses, or

(2) Any Negro who dares register is determined to exercise his right to vote.

This evaluation is made because the percentage of registered Negroes who vote is much higher than one would estimate on the basis of the social-economic levels which correlate with voting interest. The evaluation applies with somewhat less force to the counties under interview scrutiny, but it is not clear why.

Existing Public School Facilities in Florida ...and Factors of School Administration and Instructional Services Affecting Segregation*

The 1950 census revealed that Florida had grown in population since 1940 more than any state east of the Rocky Mountains. This rapid growth has probably been most sharply observable in the public schools. The present rate of growth in school population from year to year is about 8 per cent. Present school population for the year ended June 30, 1954 was 650,285 (507,276 white; 143,009 Negro) up from 603,665 the year before (467,762 white; 135,903 Negro).

There were 81 schools in 18 counties forced to run double sessions during 1953-54 as against 66 schools in 15 counties the year previous.

The classroom situation is acute. Although 671 classrooms were constructed between July 1, 1953 and July 1,

COPY BOUND VERTICALLY

1954, bringing existing classrooms up to about 18,000, it would require 5000 new classrooms this year to eliminate double sessions, relieve congested classrooms, take care of expanding enrollment and replace obsolete classrooms which should be abandoned.

The need for teachers is equally critical. Conservative estimates place the teacher need for the year 1953-54 at a figure between 4500 and 5000.

During 1953-54 Florida's 2212 school buses manned by 2038 drivers (including 359 Negro drivers) traveled 30,910,944 miles to transport 209,492 pupils at a cost of $4,506,667. The magnitude of this operation can be more readily appreciated by comparing it with that of commercial bus passenger lines which reveals that in miles traveled school buses probably equaled or exceeded the total mileage of all commercial passenger bus lines in the state in the latest recorded corresponding year.

The total cost of operating Florida's public schools for the year 1952-53 is given in Table 1, classified by major items of expenditure.

The level of support of public education in Florida underwent a substantial advance with the establishment of the 1947 Minimum Foundation Program Law. Prior to that year, the assessed value of property within a county was the primary determinant of financial support; since then the extensive tax resources of the entire state have made possible adequate financial support for the education of all the children, regardless of location or color. This structure of school finance can be described as a partnership between each county and the state, whereby the county levies taxes according to its financial ability and the state contributes to each county primarily on the basis of need. Since 1947 the gaps of inequality between the races and between rural and metropolitan areas have been steadily narrowed.

Table 2 shows that the pronounced discrepancies between white and Negro salaries existing in 1930 and 1940 were reduced to a difference of 21% in 1947 and only 7.0% in 1952-53. In like manner the percentage of discrepancy between Current Expenditure Per Negro Pupil and Current Expenditure Per White Pupil in 1930-31 was 71%, but by 1952-53 this per pupil dollar expenditure for Negroes had risen almost tenfold to where the per cent difference was only 16% less than the corresponding expenditure for whites.

During the fourth and fifth decade, the majority of Negro teachers had less than four years college training. By 1952-53, 94.7% of all Negro teachers compared to 95.6% of all white teachers had at least four years college training.

Capital Outlay Expenditures have reflected not only the inflation of enrollment, but the inflation of new residents and the inflation of construction costs. From 1937 to 1953 Capital Outlay Expenditure for Negroes amounted to $28,975,000, and for white schools the amount was $129,-246,000. The total value of public school property in Florida has been estimated at $300,000,000. Capital Outlay Expenditures Per Negro Pupil were greater than for whites in 1952-53 because of greater needs. During the two decades up to 1947 a limited State Aid Program provided some financial support without specification as to race. Starting in 1947, State Aid under the Minimum Foundation Program was allocated to the counties in such a way that no shifting of salary funds from one race to another could take place. In some counties of Florida, the Expenditures Per Negro Pupil are greater than the Expenditures Per White Pupil. This often happens when the Negro teachers as a group have either greater training or longer service than the white teachers.

Florida provides annually $400 per instruction unit for
